Ultra Vires Borrowing

PEOPLE who are asked to lend money to companies should be ever on their guard to make quite sure that the company is acting within its powers in borrowing the money. This lesson was emphasized last week when the Court of Appeal dismissed a bank's appeal against a decision that debentures given to the bank by a borrowing company were ultra vires and void (Introductions Ltd v. National Provincial Bank Ltd).

The company, Introductions Ltd, was incorporated in 1951 to provide facilities for overseas visitors to the Festival of Britain. It had a number of ancillary objects and a capital of £400. Subsequently it carried on the business of providing deck-chairs at seaside resorts. From 1958 to 1960 it carried on no business at all. Then its share capital changed hands and a new board decided to embark on an ambitious venture connected with pigs, and the company invited the public to invest in pig-breeding by becoming owners of pigs. The venture was a disaster and the company went into liquidation in 1965 with debts of about £2 million and assets of about £100,000.

It was admitted that one thing the memorandum of association did not authorize was pig-breeding, so the venture was ultra vires. In 1960 the company opened an account with the bank and became heavily overdrawn. At the bank's request the company provided security in the form of two debentures; the bank was given a copy of the memorandum and articles of association and knew that pig-breeding was the company's sole business. However, clause 3 (N) of the memorandum authorized the company 'to borrow or raise money in such manner as the company shall think fit', and in particular by the issue of debentures. The same clause ended with the common form paragraph which read: 'It is hereby declared that each of the preceding sub-clauses shall be construed independently of . . . any other sub-clause, and that the objects set out in each sub-clause are independent objects of the company'.

The liquidator of the company successfully challenged the debentures in the High Court last May so the bank appealed to the Court of Appeal, relying on the specific power in clause 3 (N). It argued that in view of clause 3 (N), it was not bound to inquire into the purpose of the loan and was not in that case affected by knowledge that the company required the money for an ultra vires activity.

The Court of Appeal rejected that argument. The Times of January 29th reports Harman, L.J., as saying that borrowing money was not an end in itself but could only be for some purpose. One could not convert a power into an object by merely saying so. Borrowing was not an activity which could stand on its own. The loan must have been for something and since that something, which was known to the bank, was an illegitimate activity, the loan itself was tainted. If the bank had been unaware of the purpose for which the money was wanted, it would not have been bound to inquire and the debentures would then have been enforceable. But knowledge of the unlawful purpose tainted the loan.

The decision impliedly upholds the decision of Roxburgh, J., in Re Jon Beauforte (London) Ltd (1953 Ch. 131).

Controlling Shareholder an 'Employee'

A NEW disadvantage for persons who carry on business through the medium of a private company has been revealed by a decision of the Queen's Bench Divisional Court in Road Transport Industry Training Board v. Reader's Garage Ltd (The Times, January 31st).

The Industrial Training Act 1964 and the Industrial Training Levy (Road Transport) Order 1967 provide for an assessment of industrial training levy on certain employers. Such an assessment was made on Reader's Garage Ltd, a one-man company of which 99 per cent of the shares were owned by the managing director, Mr E. J. Reader. Article 3 (3) of the order provides that 'The levy assessed in respect of a road transport establishment of an employer shall be an amount equal to 1·6 per cent of the sum of the emoluments of . . . (a) any person employed by the employer at or from that establishment . . . '. 'Emoluments' were defined in Article 2 (1) as 'all emoluments assessable to income tax under Schedule E'.

Mr Reader's salary as managing director was £1,450 and if this was included for levy purposes, the levy would be £58; if it was excluded it would be £35 for the period in question. The Industrial Tribunal held that there was no evidence of any service contract and that in the absence of such evidence it could not be assumed that the company had any control over Mr Reader having regard to the fact that it was he who controlled the company.

The Divisional Court sent the case back to the Tribunal to find whether there was a contract of service, taking further evidence if necessary. The Court said that if Mr Reader's main work was as a director, merely helping the workmen out in the holidays, that was one thing. But if he spent many hours in the filling station or garage with only short periods on director's duties, the Tribunal might come to a different conclusion. If the Tribunal decided that there was a contract of service, it would have to decide what the cost of those services were to the company. Sums drawn as a director simpliciter would not rank for levy but sums earned as a servant would.

Inland Revenue Struck Out as Defendants

IN Vandervell v. CIR (45 ATC 394), the House of Lords held that shares which the late Guy Anthony Vandervell had caused to be vested in a charity and which were then acquired by Vandervell Trustees Ltd, the trustee of Mr Vandervell's family trusts, had been held upon a resulting trust for Mr Vandervell, so that certain large dividends were his taxable income.

Mr Vandervell died in 1967 and his executors are now suing Vandervell Trustees Ltd for the dividends in question. If they are successful, such dividends will form part of the deceased's estate and attract estate duty. In these circumstances the executors persuaded a Chancery Master to authorize the addition of the Inland Revenue as second defendants. The executors relied on Order 15, Rule 6 (2) (b), of the Rules of the Supreme Court, which says that '. . . the Court may . . . (b) order any person who ought to have been joined as a party or whose presence before the Court is necessary to ensure that all matters in dispute . . . may be effectually and completely determined and adjudicated upon be added as a party'.

Vandervell Trustees Ltd appealed to the High Court against the addition of the Revenue, and last week Buckley, J., struck out the Revenue's name but gave the executors leave to appeal.

His lordship said it was clear that the Revenue ought not to have been joined as a party at the commencement of the proceedings. Estate duty might be affected, but the whole issue could be determined without the Revenue. He then considered whether the Revenue came within the remaining words of Rule 6 (2) (b). The matters to be determined were whether the trustee company had to account to the executors for the money. Those were issues which could be determined without the Revenue's presence.

The trustee company argued that (1) the addition of the Revenue would increase costs; (2) it would expose the trustee's witnesses to double cross-examination; and (3) if the trustee was successful, it would be at the risk of an appeal not only by the executors but also by the Revenue.

Buckley, J., emphasized that where no one objected then nothing he said was to be taken as criticizing the practice of joining the Revenue. However, there was no proper basis on which the Master could have made the order and accordingly it had to be discharged.

Practitioners may join Institute of Directors

PARTNERS and sole practitioners in professional practice – accountants, solicitors, architects, stockbrokers, etc. – are now eligible for associate membership of the Institute of Directors. A change in the rules governing admission to the Institute was announced last week. Associate members will be entitled to make full use of all the Institute's facilities and will be on an equal footing with members. They will not, however, have voting rights or be able to sponsor others.

At the Southern Society of Chartered Accountants' annual dinner recently held in Southampton (reported in The Accountant last week), left to right: Mr A. W. White, F.I.M.T.A., Treasurer, Isle of Wight County Council; Mr C. H. E. Penny, F.A.C.C.A., A.T.I.I., President, Bournemouth and Southampton Society of Certified Accountants; Mr F. W. Bright, F.C.A., President of the Southern Society; Mr Stanley Dixon, M.A., F.C.A., President, The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales; Mr L. W. Rice, B.Sc., F.C.W.A., J.Dip.M.A., President, Southampton Branch, The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants; and Mr Gordon Guest, M.A., LL.B., Town Clerk of Southampton.

Other non-directors now eligible for associate membership are (a) senior executives with managerial responsibilities equivalent to those of executive directors, and (b) proprietors of well-established and sizeable unincorporated businesses. Each applicant must be sponsored by two members of the Institute of Directors, one of whom in the case of category (a) above must be a member of the candidate's board of directors. The annual subscription, as for full members, is £8.

THIS IS MY LIFE

A Matter of Ethics

by An Industrious Accountant

THE deputy-chairman hailed me from the main stairhead. He wanted to introduce Mrs Smith, he said; he'd just been condoling with her on her bereavement. I made appropriate sympathetic noises, remembering that her late husband had been a good customer of ours; she replied suitably, though she didn't seem to me to be all that sorrowful.

She needed some really red-hot advice, continued the director with gruff heartiness. Women were so inexperienced in business matters, financial intricacies, tax wangles and all that, so as an expert perhaps I would be good enough to help her as much as possible. He laid it on a bit thick, I thought, but experience has shown me that when directors congratulate their accountants before a client, their real underlying objective is to delegate a tricky and unwanted matter as promptly as they can.

Mrs Smith somehow didn't look at all unwanted – but that she was not without cunning I was soon to learn. She was a tall, handsome woman with a watchful but amused glance under level brows. She didn't wear black. Vaguely I remembered hearing that she and the deputy-chairman were reported to share a beautiful friendship.

In my office she came straight to the point. Her problem was one of death duties. Her husband's shop had done very big business with us (another vague memory of Scotty, the sales manager, cursing the deputy-chairman's insistence on old Smith always getting such good bargains from the shirt factory) and he usually ran his account at a couple of thousand at least. Just before his death, however, he'd almost paid it off.

Could we possibly, Mrs Smith wondered, as a concession make some little adjustment in the balance? Estate duty was so ghastly in its severity . . . ?

She hesitated momentarily to assess my likely reaction to her . . . er . . . suggestion. I had seen it coming. Similar requests have, indeed, been made to me in the past: one a matter of barefaced cheek, one bargaining, one hectoring . . . always there had been unpleasantness. A firm and unemotional policy was essential.

It was, she knew, perhaps a little unorthodox; she must really apologize for even making the suggestion, she said with condescending charm. But today's financial stringency and soaring cost of living was pressing her hard. A widow, she went on, with downcast glance, had such economic difficulties; money was so terribly tight! If we could just give her a certificate of, say, a debt of the usual amount – the amount, indeed, that it would certainly be by the end of the month . . . ?

My pursed lips, momentary tapping of fingers on the desk-top to indicate severe mental stress, and slow head-shake would, I hoped, indicate the appropriate reaction. I was very sorry indeed; quite out of the question, however. Only too glad to assist in any other way possible. (I hesitated to suggest that neither her mink nor her rings betokened poverty.)

There was a long, appraising glance from across the table. An ironic murmur that it seemed such a pity. Friends elsewhere had shown no such reluctance. After all, the Revenue were professionally adept in extracting their pound of flesh; a struggling taxpayer – a valued customer – was entitled, surely, to look for help when fighting back with every possible weapon. What, might she inquire, was the reason for refusing her request?

She would doubtless appreciate, I said thoughtfully, that to issue her a false certificate would make me an accessory to an . . . ah . . . misdemeanour – a personal risk which seemed scarcely justified. (Her reaction might be interesting in its turn. Two years ago the hectorer had hinted at a bribe. Would she blunder also?)

She didn't. She was no fool. Is that the only reason? she asked, with a faint air of indulging a spoilt child, so I told her coldly that there was also the question of ethics, it was wrong, damn it, didn't she understand. Her expression didn't change; she rose unhurriedly, 'a costly refusal, perhaps', she remarked cryptically, and went her way. Judging by the deputy-chairman's glare later in the day, she might well prove right.

The First Dudley Hooper Memorial Lecture

by LORD ROBENS, Chairman of the National Coal Board

I MUST first of all express my gratitude to The British Computer Society for inviting me to deliver this lecture. I am not thinking only of the honour implied in asking a layman to address experts; nor simply of the opportunity given to me to set down my thoughts on a subject of very great personal interest to me. The fact is that I am not here on my own account, but rather on account of the very remarkable man whom this lecture commemorates, and I am grateful for the opportunity to participate in this commemoration.

The National Coal Board had the great good fortune to have Dudley Hooper working for them for almost twenty years at the height of his powers. His training and experience before 1947, in mathematics, accountancy and in the use and development of office machinery were ideal for his later tasks: but his real and characteristic strengths lay in himself. He was a man of enormous originality, persuasiveness and energy. But he was more than this: he had the combination, so rare and so essential, of bounding vision with complete practicality; and he was also always able to see beyond the intoxicating technology of electronic data processing to its effects on ordinary men and women.

It is of some interest to cast our minds back to those early years. It will not only deepen our appreciation of Dudley Hooper, but it suggests some lessons for us today.

Dudley Hooper first set down his ideas on integrated data processing in 1948 – hardly more than twenty years ago – and yet it was before the Cambridge Mathematical Laboratory had completed the world's first real computer. It was another five years before computers were in fact available for office applications. This alone is a great tribute to him.

A visionary

But technology was not the only obstacle to the accomplishment of Dudley Hooper's objectives. It was clear at that time that the first field in which computers should be used in the coal industry was the calculation of wages. It is now unfashionable to direct attention to the automating of this kind of work: the emphasis is rather on things called total management information systems. But in the early nineteen-fifties it would have seemed a little greedy to start at the end and work back towards the beginning, and, as I said, Dudley Hooper was a visionary with his feet firmly on the ground. At that time wages costs were two-thirds of the costs of coal, and in some places five men were being employed to pay 100 – an absurdly heavy burden. But even before the computer could be brought to bear, an immense work of rationalization had to be done.

This first Dudley Hooper Memorial Lecture, given in the Senate House of London University on Tuesday of last week, was instituted by The British Computer Society, of which Hooper was a founder member, first Chairman of Council and President in 1961–62.

Dudley W. Hooper, M.A., F.C.A., who died in January last year (Obituary, The Accountant, January 20th, 1968) had been Technical Officer of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales since 1964. For sixteen years before that he was in the service of the National Coal Board, first as systems and methods adviser, then from 1954, as chief organizing accountant with special responsibility for the Board's computer installations and data-processing applications. It was fitting, therefore, that Lord Robens should have been invited to present this first Memorial Lecture dedicated to Dudley Hooper.

Lord Robens's objective and reasoned approach to people and computers, a subject viewed by many with some misgiving, will be welcomed and read with interest.

The first day-wage structure came into operation in 1955, after a process which had involved research to discover and document over 6,500 different job names, analysis to boil these down to 200 distinct jobs and to slot these into just 13 grades, and finally negotiation and planning to implement an agreement covering over 250 pits and many hundreds of thousands of men. And I must add that this dealt with only those jobs which were not paid on an incentive basis.

The lesson, I believe, is this: that the proper use of computers involves immense and delicate changes in matters of very direct importance to people and in very old and complex solid structures. The brilliance of the computer professionals has proved itself capable of conquering any obstacles in their immediate fields of hardware and software. We no longer have to wait, as did Dudley Hooper, for the computer to be built. But our skills in dealing with social change have developed only slowly, and it is in the field of people that we find our most important constraints. This is why I feel the subject of 'People and computers' should be of very live and urgent interest to computer men, as it always was to Dudley Hooper.

One of the most important things about people is that it is quite as important to know what they believe on a given subject, as to know what is in fact the truth about that subject. To take an example far removed from computers: nutritional scientists will assure you that white bread is, in fact, far more healthy than wholemeal – and yet the so-called health foods are a great growth business, basically because many people believe the opposite. So it is well worth standing back from electronic data processing itself, to discuss what ordinary people believe about computers.

Popular image

Research at the Manchester Business School has shown that people's most important sources of information – or misinformation – about computers are TV and films. This means that the popular image is largely formed by a heady combination between the computer publicists and prophets and the producers, directors and scriptwriters. Now the men in the entertainment and communications industries are not scientists or managers, but artists and journalists – concerned with the dramatic and sensational, and feeling both awe and resentment at developments which they do not really understand. The result can be seen in the computer jokes and stories. You will know the types all too well – on one hand, the computerized gas bill for nought pounds nought shillings and nought pence (which is certainly a very strange idea); and, on the other, the computer which takes over the world. And to the professional computer man I would say, if you find the computer jokes a pain in the neck, it is the presentation of the computer as superhuman that you should fight. People can forgive honest error, but when something is presented to them as possessing superhuman powers of speed and accuracy, they feel threatened and will rejoice in evidence of its fallibility.

In this context, I would like to suggest that it may sometimes be right for computer people to moderate their enthusiasm at some of the potential applications of their expertise. A systems analyst is a professional innovator; it is naturally difficult for him to remember that most people – regrettably perhaps – find radical innovation frightening. I can well understand the excitement which fills the management scientist at the idea of a manless factory – I can also appreciate that the prospect fills the worker, or supervisor with a rather different excitement.

Differing interpretations

We have often heard of self-fulfilling prophecies: in the field of automation there is a possible danger of running into self-falsifying prophecies. So when speaking of the potential of the computer we should recognize that other people's interpretations will differ from our own. For example, there is no reason to doubt that developments in data storage and transmission will enable us to have a 'cash-less society', in which every kind of payment and money transfer is done inside some central computer. But the reaction of the public at large to such suggestions is only partly a sharing in the enthusiasm at the neatness and elegance of such an idea: it is at least as much a feeling that this is a gross invasion of privacy.

Irrational the reaction may be: but money is an extremely delicate subject, and the reaction might at least have been expected. There is much to be said for hastening slowly in these matters; because this is not an isolated example and the total effect of all these computer prophecies is likely to be a feeling that all the old familiar landmarks are shifting, and that nothing is secure.

This total effect is also extremely misleading, because none of those changes will come about overnight.

This is particularly important because the popular image is not only the image held by the man on the Clapham omnibus, in this case, it is the image held by most politicians, top Civil Servants and top managers. They are not superhuman, any more than computers, and they get their views on these matters from The Sunday Times Colour Supplement and 'Tomorrow's World', just like anyone else.

We need to remind ourselves from time to time that our masters are, on the whole, no cleverer than many other people – and indeed are often rather busier – so they have little opportunity for study in depth. They need to be spoonfed, and if this is not done by those who really know, there will be plenty of professional communicators and self-interested fanatics only too eager to fill the gap. It is really rather frightening to consider how so many of our rulers have acquired their mental furniture. Neither the universities nor the mass-media offer the key to the universe – it is just that they make their inmates believe they do.

A job of education

I would say that one of the most important tasks, both of the British Computer Society, and of you as individuals working in this field, is to educate the layman. I am sure that wider understanding of the true uses of the computer will be of immense benefit to the computer profession, both in the short term and in the long term. We must recognize that the job is one of education, not selling. This field, above all, is one in which people must be treated as adults and equals; any slightest suggestion of self-interested manipulation would be fatal.

We should also remember that to see is to believe and to do is to understand. The best education in computers is in seeing a computer system being installed with good results and without a painful transition.

Let us spend a moment or two discussing the various prophecies about computers that are dinned into our ears. The first prophecy is the one of limitless abundance. The working day will be of five hours, the working week will be of three days. This is a modest objective: one American has predicted a working week of half this by the end of the century. No one will start work before 25, and everyone will retire at 50. Every commodity will be freely available and we shall spend our time writing poetry and painting one another's toenails.

The second prophecy in no way rejects any of this but takes it further and appeals to those of less effervescent character. The productive capacity of society is still seen as illimitably vast but the leisure is interpreted as unemployment. The distribution of wealth is foreseen as grossly irrational. People are totally unable to occupy their time, and the elimination of work results in unrest, neurosis and despair.

The third prophecy is still wilder than the other two. This has visions of the machine becoming independent of its maker, and with ability to reproduce itself and to exercise true creativity now allied to its mythical infallibility, the computer takes over the world and enslaves man.

I have in no way exaggerated the extremes to which some of these people go – as most of you will be aware. Put in this way it would seem that we can just laugh this off, and a few more jokes about asking the computer 'Where is my father?' or 'Does God exist?' will be all to the good. It is only too clear that the world's problems will not quickly be those of limitless abundance and that the contribution of the computer to the relief of the peasants in India or in China is, at best, limited. But it is these computer myths that shape the attitudes both of our rulers and of ordinary people; it is our task to dispel these illusions.

It is worth examining in greater detail just what is wrong with these prophecies. Let us take the matter of the period of time spent at work. Presently a man might typically start work at the age of 20 and retire at 65, working during the intervening years, 40 hours a week and 50 weeks a year. In total he works for 90,000 hours during his lifetime. The prophecy I mentioned earlier implies that in the computerized future he might work in his lifetime just one-sixth of the present figure. On the assumption that half of all increases in productivity go to reducing the hours of work, as against improving the standard of living, and that productivity increases at 4 per cent compound per year, it will take 90 years to reach the 15-hours working week. In other words, this is for our grandchildren's grandchildren. To address our minds to this problem would be like Disraeli worrying about supersonic booms.

And the assumptions used are, in fact, far too generous to the other side. Britain, at least, has never during the whole of its history attained a 4 per cent annual growth in productivity over an extended period of time: and during the period of greatest productivity increase that we have known – the last 20 years – the hours actually worked did not decrease at all.

For workers in manufacturing industry, the actual hours worked per week have hovered between 44 hours and 46 hours since the First World War. And the same is true of the United States. In America, too, the drop since the First World War in hours worked is hardly perceptible; it is presently about 40 hours per week and on present trends would be somewhere between 34 and 38 per week by the year 2000. Indeed, it could well be argued their leisure has decreased since the First World War. Journeys to work have probably increased somewhat with the development between the wars of far-flung suburban estates, on prairie planning scale. Working wives leave more housework in the evening for the husband to do. All this eats into leisure time. On top of this there has been a growth in 'moonlighting' – the second job. So I do not share the view that leisure is a growing problem.

Shallow thinking

The fallacy of the prophets of the 'problem of leisure' is not just that they envisage inplausibly swift productivity increases. The real and most revealing deficiency is that their sociological thinking is extremely shallow. It is now so many years since the end of the First World War: real earnings have almost trebled, yet hours of work have not dropped. We would, therefore, be totally unjustified in assuming without any further argument, as they do, that people wish to take a significant proportion of increased wealth in the form of leisure. Rightly or wrongly, in our present society it seems proved that people would rather have a car than increased leisure – indeed, a second car – than increased leisure. This is what we see in the United States – are we to assume that human nature is going to reverse itself overnight?

No doubt at some level of wealth, people will be satisfied – but at what level?

Suppose we had been discussing this in Britain in the 1920s, and suppose we had been asked the question – 'a nation has the possibility of working 20 hours a week for three times our present income, or 40 hours for six times our income – which will it choose?' Surely we would have found it incredible that anyone would make the second choice? – yet that is just what the Americans have already done. They work just 40 hours a week, and their average income is about six times the level of income in Britain in the 1920s.

The cause is perhaps not far to seek. If we had the needs and desires of our Victorian ancestors, we would already be working a 20-hour week. But we have quite different demands – for cars, television, travel abroad. And there are solid reasons why the same pattern may continue. There are many great and dynamic firms, filled with imaginative and ambitious people, who depend for their success on thinking up new products to bring them in ever-increasing income. Glance through the pages of any American magazine, and you will be convinced of that.

Real problem of leisure

Certainly, many of these new products will be so-called 'leisure products' – most consumer goods are. But they all require money to buy them, and in the meantime all our old wants are still with us. If someone wants a colour television, it is not a matter of selling the second car, it is a matter of continuing to work those four hours overtime that he had intended to stop now the children are growing up.

So, summing up my views on limitless abundance and limitless leisure, I would say that while at some date in the future they may come about – and no one welcomes the prospect more than I do – it is not a matter that need concern us greatly as yet. Those who threaten us with leisure – as so many computer prophets do – are guilty of distracting us from the really important things.

The real problem of leisure is nothing to do with the computer, it is the problem of the retired.

Medicine is now giving people more leisure than computers, and this form of leisure poses real problems – not like the problems of what the young and fit will do with two weeks extra holiday. And these problems have another important difference from those of science fiction – they are with us now. The old-age pensioner could do with some of this limitless abundance.

But it would still be an error to brush off these prophecies. All of them contain a grain of truth, even though buried under a monstrous accumulation of distortion and publicity seeking. Indeed, the tragedy is that these myths are self-defeating. The exaggeration is too gross: people gasp and nod the head while the TV programme continues; it even becomes part of the conventional wisdom. But such science fiction can never form a basis for action. Its only influence on the real world is to throw a mist of suspicion around the whole idea of technical progress, in which what is potentially a beneficent power for man to use at his choice becomes instead an obscurely threatening spectre. Prediction should direct our line of march; science fiction merely makes people drag their feet.

Next, we have the second computer prophecy to examine; that computers will lead to massive unemployment. It is more important than the first, because it is more directly liable to cause resistance to the introduction of new methods. It is a particularly dangerous threat in Britain, because mass unemployment represents the greatest disaster that has struck this country in modern times. We do not have, as do so many Continental nations, memories of runaway inflation, of military defeat and pillage, of famine, of bitter civil strife: it is, however, natural that we should be haunted above all else, by the shadow of the 30s. Then, for every four men in work in Britain, there was one on the dole; and in Scotland and South Wales, it was one man on the dole for three in work. It is this memory that causes governments to totter when we have one man on the dole for every 35 in work.

And I should point out that the lack of opposition to the introduction of computers may not last. Up till now, the people whose jobs have been changed or eliminated have been clerks, particularly women clerks. They are weakly organized, and in the case of the women often do not attach very great importance to their jobs. The fun will start when we try to computerize some of Clive Jenkins' members!

So we must be very thorough and honest in the way we discuss the threat of technological unemployment. We might start by pointing out that the highest unemployment percentage since the Second World War is still less than one-third of the lowest percentage in the twenty years before that war. So if computers cause unemployment, it is a long while showing its head.

Harnessing technological change

As the speed of technical change quickens, so skills grow obsolete more rapidly. Technical change demands a continuous re-grouping of the range of skills required. The kaleidoscope is being constantly re-jigged. Clearly as the technological effervescence of our time gathers momentum the need for retraining grows. Technological change can be coped with if it is firmly harnessed to an effective retraining programme.

But in my judgement we must recognize that technological unemployment does happen. It is clear that, although technology may put men out of work, it is not technology that keeps them here. The fault lies in the field of regional policy and retraining policy: there is no sign at all of unemployment due to technical advance becoming widespread or uncontrollable.

What I have said should not be taken as reason for complacency and inaction, still less for defeatism and Luddism. I intend it simply as a way of concentrating attention on the real problems. The first point is that it is quite wrong to single out the computer as the danger. Any form of labour-saving in this respect from the railways or the power loom in their day, or the car or the aeroplane in this. But there are then the new jobs being created to service and construct these machines. All these must be counted, too, in the total sum.

Mentioning these other developments makes a further point: the new technologies will all employ many people themselves. I note that one of the major questions in the matter of the third London airport is where to put all the people dependent on it. The Town and Country Planning Association estimate that a new major airport will involve a community of one million people. The computer itself, often thought of as the ultimate in automation, employs tens of thousands already, at a time when we have hardly scratched the surface of its potential. Sixty per cent of the costs of a computer installation are the costs of people and this percentage is increasing. And this excludes the multitudes concerned with producing such things as the special stationery, the air conditioning equipment, the electricity and so on and so forth.

Let us, then, recognize that technological change, in which the application of the computer will play a major part, will make vast numbers of people require to change their jobs perhaps two, three or even four times in their working life. This should not worry us one iota. Knowing that this will happen we need to gear our educational system to making adequate provision for this and our social services to ensure that during the period of retraining incomes must not fall below their previous earnings. Trade unions will not have to insist that an apprentice must be from 15 years of age to 21, and must accept that extensive short-term training can equally produce skilled workers.

With a continuing affluent society the need for the production of consumer goods and services will continue to grow. More and more machines will be designed to take the physical labour out of working. More and more people will be engaged in designing machines and making them and what we must recognize is that less and less people will be required to man them. We must not say: 'There will be unemployment and change and trouble caused by the computer', but – 'how can we get the computer to work?'

All this change has important repercussions for our system of education. Before change became built in to our society, education could be clearly geared to a fixed order of life. Time did not change things and the teacher knew with some exactitude the sort of role that each pupil would have to play. In a static society ploughman follows ploughman, shepherd follows shepherd. But how much more difficult the teacher's task is today? A teacher trains virtually for the unknown. He has no idea what sort of society his pupils will move into 10, 20 or 40 years after they leave his class. Far less does he know what part they will be called upon to play. The most worth-while attitude that the teacher can impart into this situation is broadmindedness, the ability to accept and cope with change. This is a priceless commodity indeed in this changing society.

Increased skills required

But none of this will come overnight. Let us suppose that technical progress continues but only at a similar rate to that of the past 20 years. Since that includes satellites, civil jet aircraft, containerization, nuclear power, and the computer itself, this should be rapid enough for most of us. The point on which we should concentrate our minds is that any technical change which comes now, must involve changes in men's skills of a greater degree than previously known. We have now reached a stage when every technological advance increases the skill content of jobs. Mechanization reduces physical effort and also reduces skill: the computer reduces, first, clerical work; then, the more mundane control duties. The computer thus tends to increase the skill required.

This means that the average level of skill required would rise even without now inventions. The computer alone probably has potential to occupy us for the next fifty years or so. Even if the proportion of men changing their jobs remains the same, the number needing new skills will increase. A labourer who leaves one building site and goes to another has practically nothing to learn. A craftsman will find a greater number of new things to get to grips with; while a systems analyst or a manager – even though bringing with him much greater skills – also has much more to learn.

I have already said that our stale educational system should be so designed that the ability to learn new techniques and accept change – both mental and physical – is easily acquired. Training is a specialized function requiring highly intelligent and expert people. Like so much else, it is best done in large establishments enjoying economies of size. While many great firms and public bodies should be prepared to train more than they need, we are not entitled to assume that they can satisfy the whole demand.

Training problems

The Industrial Training Act already recognizes this and the dues which the Training Board levy, and the premiums they pay out, are designed to balance this. It is clear that the Training Boards have an absolutely essential part to play in giving people the skills needed for security, satisfaction and material reward in their work, and in enabling full use to be made of our productive potential. They represent a radical innovation, which must be made to work.

But however successfully they do their job, they face certain important obstacles due to unavoidable defects in their structure. In the first place, a single Training Board covering the whole of an industry – as, for example, engineering – will have to deal with a tremendous variety of needs. In their labours to provide the bread-and-butter skills, they may find it difficult to devote attention to the training of certain types of expertise involving small numbers. This might be because the particular skill, though vital, can be spread very thinly, as with very specialized branches of law or engineering consultancy. Or – and most important of all – it might be because only a few firms recognized the need for a certain recently developed skill. Few firms have qualified sociologists on their payroll – yet it might well be that the successful implementation of computer systems would be speeded with their aid. We must look for imaginative and dynamic leadership from the Training Boards to cope with this.

In the second place, many skills are not specific to a particular industry.

Computing skills are probably the most conspicuous example, although there are many others, such as work study, accountancy, statistics, sociology. I would feel happier in my own mind if I knew of positive action being taken to ensure that these skills of general application were being generated in sufficient quantities. We do not need cumbersome and unrealistically detailed manpower planning, but a system whereby the requirements of industry at large are swiftly made known and acted on.

Training is too narrow a field to confine ourselves to. Perhaps the most vital single lesson we must try both to learn and to teach, is that change is the norm. So often it is the very idea of change – any change – that frightens people. So we should be gearing our whole educational system to equipping people to deal with change. This means, quite simply, that everyone must get out of education the sort of thing that only the luckier university graduate got in the past.

Educationalists over the years have emphasized that education ought not to be the uncomprehending acquisition of narrow skills, but a free and flexible ability to deal with the challenges of life, whatever they might be. This can no longer be just a Utopian ideal – it is a pressing necessity. Once we have truly educated people, the changing skills in their particular jobs can be added as and when necessary, without difficulty and without the heartrending tear that a radical change in work now often means.

It is worth mentioning, in turn, that computers are almost certain to influence education deeply. Mathematical and logical skills will be revolutionized by it, in much the same way as the printing press led to general literacy.

The reference to the common ground shared by computers with other aspects of industry is a healthy reminder.

Too often people speak of the electronic computer as if it represented a complete break with other forms of technological advance. This is not true, and it can lead to the dangerous attitude that previous experience has nothing to teach us.

Do not misunderstand me; the computer is unique in a number of ways. The most important one is the range of activities to which it can be applied. Information is needed universally, for virtually every field of human action and thought. Information is power – or, as Carlyle put it, when a man kens, he can. It is hardly possible to name a single activity which it could not revolutionize – from the housewife planning her shopping, to the police waging war on crime. Second, the speed with which computer technology has advanced must surely be unique; and we are assured that we may expect equally stupefying advances in the future.

But in the context we are discussing, its uniqueness is questionable. Problems of change are broadly the same for the clerk as for the man on the shop floor. The wealth made available by the computer offers similar opportunities and problems to the wealth made available by more conventional mechanization. Radical change is a very new idea to most of the service industries which the computer can revolutionize; but radical change is also a stranger to many sectors of manufacturing. The computer will not often have such startling effects as those of containerization on the docks. Rolls-Royce are one of the most brilliantly successful users of computers: and they ascribe much of their success to their managing computers in exactly the same way as they manage their engineering.

So we may say that while the scale of the changes which the computer brings will be unique, the lessons we have to learn and the action we have to take are probably not. Other fields can learn from us and can teach us.

Problems of computer people

The advance of computer technology is likely to pose some problems for computer people, too. They are not immune, and we must give thought to their problems also. For example, the development of programming techniques is likely to make the ordinary programmer much less of a rare and precious being than he is today. We may yet see a strike of programmers against remote terminals, or do-it-yourself programming facilities for engineers, if we do not plan well. And if we are to end up with a computer grid, companies will have to abandon their pride in possession of their very own machines.

This is perhaps a little fanciful, but it does remind us that technical progress happens to us all. As every systems analyst knows, it is fatal to accept traditional barriers if we are to get the best from the computer. And this does not apply only to the organizational boundaries inside companies. The systems analyst will make a grave mistake if he believes that he is concerned only with information systems, he will do well also to analyse social systems, and if necessary to call in the sociologist to help him.

The point about people and the computer is not that we must protect ourselves from it, but that we must work through people in order to make the computer serve us. The barriers to communication between workers and managers, managers and computer staff, between the professions, must come down; and with them will come down the fear and ignorance that hold us back.

I would conclude by reminding you of the lessons I drew from Dudley Hooper's career: first, that as the proverb of Solomon puts it, where there is no vision the people perish; but, second, that visions are corrupting if they are not accompanied by the energy and the practical sense which alone can make them real; and, third, that it is the problems of people that we need the machine for, yet it is the problems of people that impede us.

The computer is the most astonishingly powerful tool that man has ever created; the task before us is not to argue whether it will redeem us or destroy us, but to go out and take action to ensure that it is put to good use, and swiftly, but without hurting people – the people in whose name alone we act.

The computer, rightly used, can help in the long struggle to develop the potential in human beings; to reclaim the sunken areas of man's development and create a humane, just and caring society. This must surely be the objective we all of us grasp in our different ways. The computer has its part to play, but let us remember that at the end of the day only people matter.

Financial Measurement

by JAMES M. S. RISK, B.Com., Ph.D., C.A., F.C.W.A., J.Dip.M.A., F.C.I.S., F.B.I.M., M.I.O.M., M.I.M.C.

IT is welcome news (The Accountant, December 28th) that 'Financial Measurement and Communication' is contemplated as the theme of the technical programme of the Tenth International Congress of Accountants to be held in Sydney in October 1972.

The news is welcome for two reasons:

(1) It shows an expansion of thought as to the purposes of accountancy – the mental shackles of double entry systems and of book-keeping as such are being thrown off.

(2) It also shows a realization that accountants now have a need and duty to communicate the results of their work to others.

Principles and purposes

Book-keeping is of immense value in the affairs of men; let us not forget how much we owe to this traditional technique and indeed to those who carry out the process. However, the term 'accountancy' connotes something of a more complex and higher order of abstraction of real events and much thought is now being given in various parts of the world to the principles of accountancy. A search is being made to discover underlying principles.

Purposes are also important. One of the most important purposes of accountancy is surely the measurement of the resources used up in producing a given volume of output or in providing a measured quantity of some service. Ancillary to this is the comparison of the cost of the resources used up with the value attached to the output by an actual buyer of the goods or services.

But let it be noted that the first part of the statement of purpose is relevant to non-profit making organizations; in more than one country of the world a large part of the national income is consumed by non-profit making activities. These also require measurement; cost effectiveness is of national importance.

Measurement in general

Two well-known statements are fundamental in the discussion of financial measurement. The first of these comes from the famous physicist, Lord Kelvin, who said:

> 'When you can measure what you are speaking of and express it in numbers, you know that on which you are discoursing; but when you cannot measure it and express it in numbers, your knowledge is of a very meagre and unsatisfactory kind.'

The second important statement is of more recent origin. It was spoken by Sir Charles Renold in 1950 when addressing a gathering of accountants. He said:

> 'The extreme importance of the technique of accountancy lies in the fact that it works in the most nearly universal medium available for the expression of facts, so that facts of great diversity can be presented in the same picture.'[1]

These two statements are of crucial significance.

This is how Equity & Law are advising the public to seek professional advice about life assurance

The sad but not unusual tale of Dilatory Desmond

Desmond's life is (or was!) governed by a simple motto—never do today what you can put off till tomorrow.

But Desmond was dutiful. And so, when he acquired a wife and family, he naturally thought of taking out a life assurance policy to protect them.
Not only thought, but thought and thought and thought.
"Certainly I must do what is right," he'd say to himself.
"And soon. Or fairly soon. Or one of these fine days."

It was during such a noble soliloquy that he stepped on a banana skin and slid gracefully under a No 13 bus.
The late Desmond had left it too late again.

Moral: If you are not yet covered by life assurance, the time to do it is now. And the way to do it is to consult an insurance broker, or your usual professional adviser. He may well solve your problem in three simple words... Equity & Law.

Since Lord Kelvin's time, many writers have pleaded for more and better means of measurement. For example, one of the Anglo-American reports on productivity had this to say in 1953:

> 'Measurement and the ability to interpret measurement are fundamental to any system of costing.'

Lord Netherthorpe, in the annual review of the British Productivity Council for 1962–63, referred to the guiding principles likely to lead to higher productivity, embodying the experience of leading firms up and down the country. The first of these principles is:

> 'Measurement – in every sphere, whether of capital or material utilization, or of human effort, measurement is the indispensable basis for any form of comparison and hence for improvement.'

Again, in the bulletin of The Institution of Electrical Engineers published on September 15th, 1967, when announcing the formation of a new professional group on 'Measurement and Control Equipment' it was stated that:

> 'Measurement lies at the heart of control, whether the corrective action be immediate and direct as in a simple servo-system or whether it involves data processing and management decisions as in the running of a business.'

It should be clear that measurement is a matter of the greatest practical importance – and often of not inconsiderable difficulty.

Financial measurement

Turning to the statement of the late Sir Charles Renold, at first sight this may seem a little trite; some may feel that he merely called attention to the fact that business transactions are for the most part expressed in terms of money.

But let us examine it a little more closely. What is involved in the cost of a single product? Materials, labour, overhead? Materials may have been 'unearthed' overseas, sorted or processed partly or entirely and then transported perhaps thousands of miles to the country of use, there to be carried to some receiving point before eventually being issued to the production processes.

It will be noted that effort will have been expended and machinery and transport will probably have been used to a greater or less extent. The price paid for the labour and services can be measured or assessed – but what about the crude raw materials themselves? Is there, in fact, any 'cost', or must one merely accept as cost the value which the next person in the chain of events is willing to pay after deducting measured or assessed labour and services and profit of the supplier?

What of the direct labour element in the main organization under consideration? When work is done, there is a combination of physical effort given out from moment to moment, revealing the skill and experience of the person doing the work. (The same physical effort by different persons may not, of course, be equally productive because of differences in training, experience and inborn skill.)

Next there comes the difficult question of overheads. Take just one of these – if indeed it amounts to an overhead – namely, the charge for using productive plant and machinery.

Consider just one piece of machinery. It may have been made overseas or in the country of use; it may be 100 years old or brand new; it may be of ingenious design or lacking in ingenuity; it may be in good condition or the reverse. The conditions vary widely. Nevertheless, accountants try to measure that part of the worth of the machine which has been used up in the process of manufacture of a product in a given period of time. It is no simple task.

To recapitulate, measurements which are expressed in terms of money – that is, in financial terms – seek to bring together into one sensible whole, a variety of quite different types of item: direct materials; direct labour (skill, effort, experience); and solid inanimate things such as plant and machinery – some of which may outlive the immediate use by tens of years.

So when we look at a single product cost we have 'facts of great diversity presented in the same picture'. And this is the simplest of pictures; others are many times more complex. Financial measurements are of great value in the affairs of mankind. Although at first sight they are simple to construct, the underlying assumptions and estimates often involve great difficulty.

It has been pointed out that a simple product cost involves a number of physical things: materials, transport, services, effort, plant and machinery. When these are combined, the money symbols still represent a combination of physical things; they combine in one form of financial measurement. The more accurate we can make the translation from the physical aspect to the financial the better should the measurement be.

Inflation v. cost reduction

Now the amount of material needed to make a product under a stated specification will not change from one year to another, but the price asked by the supplier of materials or labour may well have changed from time to time. Thus in converting physical things into financial measurements, the price per unit used in the process of conversion may be a fluctuating one – and experience suggests that the fluctuations will tend to be upwards. In other words, we observe an element of inflation.

However, inflation may take place gradually over a period of time, often quite a considerable period of time. In the same period, technical and organizational improvements bring about an improvement in productivity – smaller quantities of materials or labour and so on, for a given output. Do the improvements equal or exceed the change in the price factors? And do they need to be brought into the financial measurements? If inflation is allowed for, should not also improved technology be reflected in the same financial measurement? If one, why not the other? Is the state of affairs on this earth static or dynamic? These are some of the questions and problems which need deeper attention.

There is a saying that 'when the Lord made time, he made plenty of it'. Certainly time stretches out from the present moment to an infinite extent and history is not composed of a number of annual cycles of birth and decay but is a reflection of many events and situations; some of these are short-lived, while others last for many years. But accountants still try to present a picture of what an organization does when measured over so short a period as 365 days.

What are some of the items which have a duration or an effect beyond a single year? What about the following?

(i) research and development work;

(ii) sustained advertising and other forms of sales promotion;

(iii) long-term contracts for the supply of raw materials or services, e.g., power supplies;

(iv) long-term contracts for the sale of goods to customers;

(v) training of staff, the benefit from which is hoped for in future years;

(vi) purchase of plant and machinery with many years of useful life.

What other items are there of this nature? Does the design of products come into it? Do some products age quicker than others?

Despite all difficulties, the accountant manfully assays to snip a small cross-section of time from the moving band of events across the world— and maybe under the oceans and in the skies above.

Abundance of accounting tools

The time is not long past when an accountant would consider that the profit and loss account and balance sheet represented all the financial measurements available for the management of an organization. Perhaps there are some who still hold to this view; indeed, one is often forced to this conclusion by the number of times one finds efforts being made to telescope past, present and future into one accounting document.

The one-tool accountant is like a stone-age man with a stone-age hammer and nothing else: he has but one blunt instrument to serve all purposes. But there is an abundance of accounting tools available for those who will take the trouble to use them.

Take the tool of classification, for instance. The principles of classification are not hard to follow but their application requires intelligence and study. For example, the classification of accounting statements according to whether they aim to reflect past, present or future events is one facet which is constantly being outraged. Let us note again, time may be PAST, PRESENT or FUTURE. The attempt to combine two or more 'vectors' of time in one statement is at the root of much confusion when seeking to measure profit and return on investment. The confusion is frequently connected with plant and machinery and other types of capital asset.

Another field of confusion is the failure to distinguish between COST and VALUE. The difficulty usually arises when two people expect one statement to provide sensible answers to two different types of question.

Patterns of accounting

If, in fact, we have progressed beyond the stone-age type of accountant with his little stone hammer then there is work to be done in sorting out the nature and purpose of the various tools now available.

While a variety of forms of profit statement now exist, there still remains the problems of time and valuation: are we looking at the past results or the present position? Are we trying to value the business or do we wish to know its present position derived from past actions? For example, provided each statement is properly labelled, may we not have a balance sheet – and hence a profit statement – showing first of all what has, indeed, happened? This would be called ACTUAL RESULTS.

Then, if it was found that certain land and buildings could be sold for more than their written-down worth, though if this were done the business would have to cease, we could have a PRESENT HYPOTHETICAL statement. It would be hypothetical because there would probably be no intention of trying to sell the land and buildings.

The next basis could be a PRESENT NOTIONAL form, where a particular building could be sold without destroying the rest of the business though the directors may have decided not to do so. By inserting the notional higher figure for the building, the balance sheet would be a notional one. The increase in the asset amount would be balanced by an 'inflation accumulation account' on the other side of the balance sheet. Sometimes the increase might be due to factors other than inflation.

Next we come to the FUTURE HYPOTHETICAL and NOTIONAL forms in which saleable assets such as land and buildings would be entered in the balance sheet at their estimated saleable value in 12 months time or two years time, and so on – the predicted date would need to be stated. The distinction between 'hypothetical' and 'notional' would be as explained earlier.

There follows the FUTURE ESTIMATED form in which items such as plant and machinery will have been entered at what was believed will be the cost of replacing such items as at 12 months, or two years hence, and so on. If desired, depreciation would be deducted from the enhanced cost figures for the number of years the present assets have been owned. There is, of course, no guarantee that the present assets will be replaced at all; or that any new machine will be of the same type etc., as the old one. The past does not always repeat itself.

It will be noted that a distinction has been made between RE-VALUING an asset (one which can be sold because there is a willing buyer) and RE-COSTING an asset (because the present or future replacement cost has risen). The second process seems to involve writing up a machine which is possibly already half worn out. There may be a combination of FUTURE HYPOTHETICAL and FUTURE ESTIMATED procedures.

While the examples given relate to fixed assets, current assets may be reviewed in the same manner. The above analysis may seem somewhat complex, but is this not what often happens at the present time – without so much as a hint to the reader that one or other form (or a mixture of several) has been adopted?

Does history repeat itself?

Behind the thinking of those who wish to introduce part of the future into a present-day balance sheet, there appears to be an underlying conviction that history will repeat itself. Perhaps the long era of nineteenth-century peace encouraged such an assumption. But in the days of twentieth century space exploration, who would be so bold as to uphold such an opinion?

The 'repeating-history' school of thought seems to take one back to the 'double account' system with its stock of capital assets always to be maintained at its pristine size. One is reminded of the ancient Egyptians with their unchanging cycle of events from one generation to another.

The expanding universe of knowledge

If knowledge remained constant, there might be some support for the repeating-cycle concept of accounting, but even by one's own limited personal observation it is known that knowledge is expanding; indeed, it is claimed that the sum total of human knowledge doubles every few years.

The man-hours needed to make a machine tool will be changing from year to year, inclusive of all the supplies and services involved in the machine tool's manufacture. The design of the tool will probably have been improved; the tool may have a wider application, be more accurate, easier to operate, safer to use, and so on. We are, in short, not dealing with a static society.

Profit and loss accounts

It seems at first sight somewhat strange that so often we refer to a profit and loss account when only a single figure of profit or of loss will appear at the end of the statement. Why should we expect both profits and losses to be shown? Do we have to think back to medieval times when the merchants of Venice were wont to send their ships to trade with the world and when they decided to strike a balance some of the voyages would have resulted in profits but perhaps a few had turned out as losses? Hence there would be both profits and losses in the statement of the reckoning.

In the case of a manufacturing company, it is seldom that one can say that a certain number of activities have started and terminated in a given period of time, say a year, and that a variety of profits and of losses have arisen.

This is because there is a continuing stream of events and the continual appearance of new activities and actions. These are all so inextricably intertwined that it is not practicable to disentangle them so as to present a statement of profits and losses.

Stream of episodes

In modern manufacturing and distributing industry and commerce we find a stream of episodes of varying significance, rather than a single venture which has a beginning and an end. In other words, each new decision – e.g., to engage a new employee or to invest in a piece of plant and machinery – represents a new venture, however tiny the amount involved may be in relation to the whole undertaking.

The business is constantly changing. Change is normal. We may say that business is the sum total of a multifarious stream of episodes. This concept is at variance with some of the underlying assumptions of the view which harks back to the double account approach; to an inviolate fund of capital subscribed at the beginning and which must be maintained intact. Intact, however, in what way? The original subscribers have probably long since passed away and others have inherited their shares at no cost to themselves, or have purchased their shares on the open market.

Conclusion

Enough has been said to show that the term 'financial measurement' does not relate to a single uncomplicated procedure. There is scope for much research and study so that in the course of time, accountancy may emerge from its present state of confusion. If such criticism seems too harsh, a glance at a few issues of current accounting periodicals should serve to dispel any idea that we have reached finality in the development of accountancy and financial measurement.

Perhaps these thoughts will serve to centre some attention on matters which will doubtless be dealt with more exhaustively at the Tenth International Congress in 1972.

Author's footnote: Nothing has been said about 'communication' which is the second part of the theme contemplated for the Tenth International Congress: communication is a further aspect for consideration, once the principles and practice of financial measurement have been clarified.

Protecting Business Rights

by H. S. A. MACNAIR, F.C.A.

THE outlay of capital is prohibited as a deduction in computing the amount of the profits or gains to be charged under Case I or II of Schedule D (section 137 (f) of the Income Tax Act 1952). This rule is overridden by section 139 which provides that there may be deducted as expenses any fees paid or expenses incurred in obtaining, for the purposes of the trade, the grant of a patent and the extension of its term, the registration of a design or trade-mark, the extension of the period of copyright in a design or the renewal of registration of a trade-mark.

The exclusive right to use a distinctive trade-mark in connection with his goods is acquired by a trader by registration at the Patent Office and cannot be dissociated from that business although it may be assigned with the goodwill (Geldart on Elements of English Law, by Houldsworth and Hanbury, Chapter V). Section 12 of the Sale of Goods Act 1893 states that in a contract of sale, unless the circumstances of the contract are such as to show a different intention, there is an implied condition on the part of the seller that, in the case of a sale, he has the right to sell the goods. Hence the sale of goods incorrectly marked can lead to a claim for damages by the buyer (assuming he can remove the mark and sell the goods unbranded) or rejection of the goods (Chalmers on Sale of Goods, by Mark).

The 1893 Act denied the buyer a right of rejection where, in a contract for specific goods, the property in them had passed to the buyer but this rule was repealed by section 4 of the Misrepresentation Act 1967. Moreover, the terms of section 35 of the 1893 Act, in relation to estoppel where acts inconsistent with the ownership of the seller take place after delivery to the buyer, are modified to enable the buyer to take advantage of section 34 which precludes a presumption of acceptance without reasonable opportunity of examination of the goods.

Whether trade-mark registrable

In Cheney v. Conn (46 ATC 192) a taxpayer sought to invoke international law in opposition to an income tax assessment but it was to moral considerations that an appeal was made in re Stredoceska Podnik's Application ([1969] 1 WLR 36). Section 11 of the Trade Marks Act 1938 states that it is unlawful to register matter the use of which would, by reason of its being likely to deceive or cause confusion or otherwise, be disentitled to protection in a Court of justice, or would be contrary to law or morality, or any scandalous design.

The appellant alleged nationalization of his East European business without due compensation as the moral objection to permitting registration of a mark submitted by his successor in that territory. However, the paucity of evidence led Plowman, J., to declare the whole matter too nebulous to justify the conclusion that some moral principle would be infringed if he allowed the application to proceed.

On the issue of confusion, a dictum was quoted to the effect that where a trade-mark has been long used by a person who is applying to register it, it will not be refused on the ground of recent use of a similar mark by another trader. The mark by such use does not become calculated to deceive. The appellant's use in his later trade in England was not established to the satisfaction of the learned judge as having created a sufficiently substantial reputation in the United Kingdom to place on the respondent the burden of showing that confusion would not result from registration. In the circumstances the registration decision in favour of the East European trader was upheld.

Registration of a design

The Registered Designs Act 1949 provided for registration of designs by the person claiming to be proprietor, in respect of any specified article or set of articles. 'Design' is defined by section 1 as meaning features of shape, configuration, pattern or ornament applied to an article by any industrial process or means, being features which in the finished article appeal to and are judged by the eye. 'Design' does not include a method or principle of construction or features of shape or configuration which are dictated solely by the function which the article to be made has to perform (e.g., a kettle).

In general, the author is to be treated as proprietor but the position of an employer is covered by treating as proprietor a person for whom the design is executed by the author, for good consideration. Changes of ownership are also recognized (section 2). If it is desired to claim both shape and pattern, separate registrations are advisable. If only shape (or pattern) is the essential feature the novelty of which is to be protected, protection of the alternative element should be disclaimed (see Copyright in Industrial Designs, by Russell-Clarke, Chapter 2).

Copyright and design

The general rule in section 1 of the Copyright Act 1956 is that the copyright in a work is infringed by any person who, not being the owner and not having a licence, does (or purports to authorize) acts specified in the Act in relation to various classes of work. Thus section 3 specifies among other acts reproducing an artistic work in a material form. For this purpose 'artistic work' means works of architecture, whether buildings or models, and (irrespective of artistic quality) paintings, sculptures, drawings, engravings and photographs, together with works of artistic craftsmanship not within those classes.

There can be a conflict between copyright subsisting in an artistic work and in a corresponding design registered under the Registered Designs Act 1949. Section 10 of the 1956 Act, therefore, provided that no infringement was to result from anything done in relation to a registered design, subject to the limitations of the first schedule to that Act, being acts within the scope of the copyright in the design. There was an extension to periods after the copyright in the registered design had come to an end and to equivalent periods related to articles not the subject of registered designs which have been sold, hired or offered for those purposes under licence.

The Design Copyright Act 1968 makes radical alterations in the 1956 Act. The location of sale or hire may be in the United Kingdom or elsewhere. The protection previously given where a corresponding design (a design which, when applied to an article, results in a reproduction of the artistic work) is applied industrially under licence in the absence of registration is reaffirmed for non-licensees only in relation to periods after the initial 15 years from first sale or hire. Hence the copyright owner once more has a trial period in which to licence industrial production before forfeiting the right to deny infringements through failure to register under the 1949 Act. However, the position of a licensee of a purported proprietor of a registered design is protected, despite the repeal of subsection 10 (1) of the 1956 Act, by substituting the words 'this shall be a good defence to such proceedings' in the context of the first schedule to that Act.

Preserving business assets

Despite the special terms of section 139 of the Income Tax Act 1952, it does not follow that the cost of defending a taxpayer's title or rights to business assets cannot be established as a valid charge against trading profits on the ground that it is wholly and exclusively laid out for business purposes (section 137 (a)). The classic authority for this is Southern v. Borax Consolidated Ltd (19 ATC 435; 23 TC 597) which related to legal expenses of over £6,000 incurred in defending title to land used for business in the United States. It is interesting to observe that success was not a criterion of deductibility, for this amount related to the costs of six years' litigation following which the proceedings began again with a new trial.

Although only a High Court decision, this case owes its authority to having been cited with approval on later occasions, notably in Morgan v. Tate & Lyle Ltd (33 ATC 184; 35 TC 367). It is noteworthy that the Borax case was accorded recognition even in the dissenting judgments, e.g., Lord Keith of Avonholm observed that the land was just a trading asset of the company (Borax) on the use of which it relied for making profits. Thus expenditure incurred in protecting that asset could in law be properly regarded as expenditure made for the purposes of that trade. He went on to say:

> 'I see no reason why a similar conclusion could not be reached where a trading company or syndicate had only one asset, say a mine or piece of land, and was put to expense in defending its title to that asset.'

although the need to distinguish between an outlay of revenue as opposed to capital would remain.

The fact that so few cases are reported on law costs suggests that the amounts involved are rarely large enough to justify a further bout of litigation, although Inspectors of Taxes display unremitting curiosity as to the nature of a trader's legal costs. Although it is perhaps unwise to hazard a guess in this field, it may be thought that the facts in such recent cases as Anisminic Ltd v. Foreign Compensation Commission and Another (The Times, December 18th, 1968), and Carl Zeiss Stiftung v. Herbert Smith & Co and Another (The Accountant, December 21st, 1968), aptly illustrate situations in which law costs might be claimed as expenditure on revenue account.

Removing obstacle to trade

Indeed in CIR v. Carron Company ([1968] TR 173), the House of Lords approved the assignment of a revenue character to expenditure which procured an advantage – important and not of a transitory nature – which enabled the management and conduct of the company's business to be carried on more efficiently. The Carron Company had incurred legal expenses of over £3,000 in obtaining a supplementary charter and of over £4,000 in disposing of preliminary opposition (which cost over £80,000 to settle). However, in answer to the Revenue's contention that an enduring advantage had resulted in accordance with the principle in British Insulated & Helsby Cables Ltd v. Atherton (4 ATC 47; 10 TC 155), the two Special Commissioners returned the wise answer, 'we see no new capital asset'.

'Quiet possession' is a quaint phrase which crops up in leases and which may be said to epitomize one of the ingredients of successful business which justify expenditure on revenue account. Thus in Mitchell v. B. W. Noble Ltd (6 ATC 173; 11 TC 372) a payment of nearly £20,000 to get rid of an unwanted director was described by Lord Hanworth, M.R., as a payment made in the course of business, dealing with a particular difficulty which arose in the course of the year, and made not in order to secure an actual asset to the company but to enable them to continue, as they had in the past, to carry on the same type and quality of business unfettered and unimperilled by the presence of one who, if the public had known about it, might have caused difficulty to their business and whom it was necessary to deal with and settle with at once.

Again in Anglo-Persian Oil Co Ltd v. Dale (10 ATC 149; 16 TC 253), a payment of £300,000 to eliminate a commission agent was admitted as a deduction against trading profits, the scale of commission having become burdensome. An interesting illustration of the other side of the coin occurs in British-Borneo Petroleum Syndicate Ltd v. Cropper ([1968] TR 255), where £900,000 was received on surrendering rights to royalties under an agreement exchanged for a concession prospected at a cost of £45,000 in the years before 1922. Although the latter had represented a trading asset the agreement in the course of time mysteriously became transmuted into a fixed capital asset, according to the decision by Plowman, J., which reversed that of the Special Commissioners.

Territorial goodwill

It is curious that the asset most clearly identified as capital is goodwill, which comes into being mainly as a result of successful trading. In Evans Medical Supplies Ltd v. Moriarty (36 ATC 277; 37 TC 540), the loss of its Burmese market meant that £100,000 received by a manufacturer for co-operation in setting up an indigenous pharmaceutical industry represented consideration for the disposal of (part of) a fixed capital asset. Similarly, 'keep-out' covenants in an agreement for the exploitation of patents led the Special Commissioners to split the consideration half and half between the fixed capital asset lost through exclusion from a particular trading area and the revenue services provided by way of technical assistance (Murray v. Imperial Chemical Industries Ltd (46 ATC 138)). A recent illustration occurs in Wolf Electric Tools Ltd v. Wilson (The Accountant, January 11th).

The facts in the above cases concerned the period before March 20th, 1968, from which date the provisions of section 21 of the Finance Act 1968 began to apply. Thereafter the general rule is that where a person disposes of know-how which has been used in a trade carried on by him, and continues to carry on the trade after the disposal, the amount or value of any consideration received by him for the disposal is to be treated as a trading receipt (so far as not already taxed). This rule does not apply where the transfer takes place between companies (or a partnership) under common control, the term 'control' being interpreted by section 87 (1) of the Capital Allowances Act 1968 with Part I of which the 1968 legislation is consolidated.

Know-how and restrictive covenants

'Know-how' is defined as meaning any industrial information and techniques likely to assist in the manufacture or processing of goods or materials, or in the working of a mine, oil-well, or other source of mineral deposits (including the searching for, discovery or testing of deposits or the winning of access thereto), or in the carrying out of any agricultural, forestry or fishing operations.

Section 21 (8) of the Finance Act 1968 provides that where, in connection with any disposal of know-how, a person gives an undertaking (whether absolute or qualified, and whether legally valid or not) the tenor or effect of which is to restrict his or another's activities in any way, any consideration received in respect of the giving of the undertaking or its total or partial fulfilment is to be treated as consideration received for the disposal of the know-how. The converse does not apply to consideration paid.

Disposal of trade

When a person disposes of know-how together with a trade or part of a trade in which it is used, the general rule is that on both sides the consideration passing is to be treated as a payment for goodwill – a rule with particular significance in relation to the 'roll-over' provisions of section 33 of the Finance Act 1965, relating to chargeable capital gains. This rule is set aside if the trade had previously been carried on wholly outside the United Kingdom. Thus the acquirer's right to receive writing-down allowances over a period of six years is validated, despite the general rule which presupposes acquisition for an existing trade or one to be commenced thereafter. The 'goodwill' rule can also be set aside by notice given jointly within two years of the disposal.

It may happen that know-how is generated without specific reference to existing trade use. Hence consideration derived on disposal is taxed under the 'sweeping-up' Case VI of Schedule D and as a corollary the disponor is permitted to deduct expenditure incurred wholly and exclusively in the acquisition or disposal. Moreover an individual deviser obtains earned income relief, a small mercy evidently modelled on section 320 of the Income Tax Act 1952 which grants relief against income from a patent to an individual who (alone or jointly) actually devised the invention.

A non-trader is also allowed relief for expenses incurred on the grant, renewal or extension of a patent as well as those expenses he would have been allowed if trading. For both classes relief is extended to cover the case where a patent application has been rejected or abandoned (section 23 of the Finance Act 1952).

Gold – or Paper Gold

by PAUL BAREAU

An address to the London and District Society of Chartered Accountants by the well-known financial journalist who formerly was Editor of The Statist

I WANT to begin my talk about the international monetary system, with special reference to gold or its alternative — paper gold, by giving you my text – or the converse of my text – which was the Chancellor of the Exchequer's remark a few days ago that there was no need in 1969 for another Bretton Woods. I will deny that remark.

As for my qualification to talk about this, may I say that I am one of the few survivors of the age of Bretton Woods. I did not actually go to the Bretton Woods Conference, but in the Bretton Woods year I was attached to the United Kingdom Treasury; I was sent to Washington as part of the United Kingdom Treasury delegation and there I worked very closely with Lord Keynes, who was leader of our Bretton Woods delegation. I attended the first meeting of the International Monetary Fund and Governors of the World Bank in Savannah in Georgia in the spring of 1946 – the last of the international meetings which Keynes attended.

Far-sighted statesmanship

May I say here that to look back on this Bretton Woods Conference is really a remarkable experience; because here we have a unique piece of far-sighted statesmanship. Here we were in 1943, when all the preparatory work was done in the deepest, gloomiest days of the war, when victory was a long, long way ahead, when we ought to have been concerned essentially about the task of saving our necks. And yet some of the best brains in the Treasury here in London, in Washington and in Ottawa concerned themselves about laying the plans – drawing the blueprints – for the economic reconstruction of the brave new world that would emerge after victory had been won. We had the International Monetary Fund to look after monetary behaviour, after the stability of exchanges; the World Bank to provide capital for reconstruction; and a code of commercial behaviour which was ultimately converted into the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade – GATT.

If ever there was an example of wise foresight, this was it – and what a contrast it provides to the kind of improvisation, backs-to-the-wall gimmickry, which we have pursued in the last few years and which, may I say, we will continue to pursue if the Chancellor of the Exchequer's words should be taken at their face value, namely, that there is no need now to look again at the international monetary system.

I understand his reasons for saying this, because the moment you say that there is going to be another 'Bretton Woods', you create the very uncertainty about exchange rates, the price of gold and the rest of it, on which speculation so easily feeds. But I hope that Mr Roy Jenkins realizes this and has this particular reservation as a 'tongue in his cheek' and is, in fact, prepared to do the necessary preparatory work for what will be, in my view, and what has to be, another 'Bretton Woods' conference.

I also agree with him if he means by a 'Bretton Woods' conference, a gathering of all the members of the International Monetary Fund – all 110 of them – gathered round a mammoth table and attempting to solve their exchange rates, price of gold and the rest, whilst, presumably, the exchange markets of the world close for one or two months!

That, of course, is not the way to tackle this problem and, indeed, Bretton Woods itself, where about 20 nations were represented, was merely an occasion which rubber-stamped the decisions which had been reached by Keynes in London, Harry White in Washington and Rasminsky in Ottawa.

Philosopher wanted

This was really an admirable example of anticipation, and it proves the case for having at the Treasury, and in some Government departments, the kind of philosopher who can sit back and think about these wider issues of the future without concerning himself with immediate administrative responsibilities. Unfortunately, philosophers of that kind are in very scarce supply today.

What emerged from Bretton Woods was, of course, a compromise and it is interesting to see that Keynes's original ideas about creating a central bank of central banks which would create its own reserves – he used to call them 'bancors' because they would be bank credit but would be based on gold – are now coming back into fashion with the special drawing rights which we hope will be issued by the International Monetary Fund in the near future.

The basic principle of Keynes's view of the International Monetary Fund was the primacy of domestic policy. He was still hearing the echoes of the inter-war recession, of massive unemployment and he felt that never again should the rigidity of exchange rates demand of a country the under-utilization of its resources. Therefore, he said, domestic policy must be the priority No. 1 and the external exchange rates must adjust themselves to that. Accordingly, there must be a considerably greater measure of flexibility in exchange rates – changes in parities – than we had under the old gold exchange standard days.

The mis-calculations which were made then were, first, on what this primacy of domestic policy would involve. The fear was that we would be beset at the end of the Second World War by another world depression and deflation – a repetition of the disastrous conditions that we endured after the First World War. Nobody realized at that time that, in fact, the very reverse would be the situation, and that the main problem would be that of continuous inflation – continuous erosion in the value of money.

The other miscalculation was that we underestimated the difficulties of changing exchange rates, of changing parities, in an era of convertible currencies. We underestimated the difficulties that would meet any attempt at changing exchange rates while vast movements of hot money, of convertible currencies, were there ready to anticipate and to speculate on these changes in exchange rates.

What went wrong?

What has gone wrong with the Bretton Woods system? Let me say first of all that it has done incredibly good work. Its accomplishment can really be measured by comparing the post-First World War period with the post-Second World War period. In the post-First World War, this attempt to get back to normalcy created the series of crises, the under-employment of human and material resources, which before long sowed the seeds of the Second World War.

After the Second World War we had an unprecedented expansion of world trade, the most astonishing expansion of economic activity throughout the world. We have had to pay a price for it, admittedly; but let us not forget the substantial achievements which have been secured in those years and for which the work done at Bretton Woods must be given a very great deal of credit.

But what went wrong? First, with gold fixed at 35 dollars an ounce, there was an inadequate supply of this metal to feed world monetary reserves. That void was for a time filled by the reserve currencies – dollars and sterling. They provided the really dynamic element in the increase in world reserves, but this very system carried within itself the seeds of its own destruction. The reason is this, that the rest of the world could only be fed with additional dollars or sterling if the two reserve currency countries – the United States and the United Kingdom – ran persistent balance of payments deficits. This is the only rest. But there is a point beyond which this persistence of deficits undermines the willingness of other countries to hold these currencies.

That point was reached dramatically in the case of sterling last year, with the so-called Basle Agreement in which we had to give members of the Sterling Area way in which dollars get out of the United States and into the reserves of Germany, France, Italy and the prepared to hold sterling as part of their reserves, a dollar guarantee on the bulk of their sterling balances. This was ignominious in some ways, but a facing up to the realities of 1968. In the case of the dollar, it is only maintained by other countries as a result of a series of gentlemen's agreements by which the central banks of the major countries are prepared for the time being not to convert into gold the dollars which they have acquired, as a result of the balance of payments deficit of the United States.

Not long ago I was talking to a Swiss banker who was complaining about the enormous increase in the dollars which the Swiss National Bank had had to acquire as a result of the recent run out of dollars and into other currencies, including, of course, the Swiss franc. He said: 'We don't convert because of this gentleman's agreement', and he added: 'You know it is high time we ceased to be gentlemen and became Swiss again!'

It is on that kind of flimsy foundation that the remnants of the gold exchange standard is now being run. It is also being protected by a rigid exchange control on the part of the United States; by very severe control on the export of capital – on the amount of capital that can be raised by other countries in the United States – which is hardly the best advertisement for a great international reserve currency.

Disintegration

What is the evidence of disintegration in the system as we have operated it since the end of the war? It is first to be found in the gimmicks which have been used to hold it together. Let me mention the latest addition to these gimmicks to which the name 're-cycling' has been given. This is a device suggested by Mr Fowler – now no longer US Secretary to the Treasury – that all central banks should undertake automatically to re-cycle (that means to push back to the countries whence hot money has come) the money that has gone to the re-cycling country. For example, Germany faced with an inflow of hot money – as it was in November and December last – from the UK and particularly from France, should immediately be prepared to relend, re-cycle, the money back to France and to the United Kingdom. This is, complete and utter fantasy and nonsense. It betokens a kind of international monetary system in which all discipline disappears because all the results of indiscipline are neutralized by devices of that kind. I take this as one evidence of this process of disintegration.

Another is the obvious imbalance in major balances of payments. We have now run a deficit for five successive years; Germany is running a massive and mounting surplus. Japan and Italy are doing the same.

Inspect very closely

We always do

Everything to do with the manufacture of boilers and pressure vessels comes under the scrutiny of National and Vulcan Special Services. Everything is looked into, checked, approved, from production drawings through all construction stages to final testing. Nothing escapes our eagle eye.

Our business is to protect the purchaser. And to help the consultant, the contractor and the manufacturer. We rely, they all rely, on the meticulous skill of more than 700 engineer surveyors and a headquarters staff including over 100 supervisory engineers. Which is another way of saying reliability first is NV first.

Special Services is but one part of the National and Vulcan activity. We also provide the finest plant inspection services, including non-destructive testing, backed by unrivalled technical experience and resources.

If you would like to know how NV can be of service to you, contact Mr. Cyril S. Hayden.

France has run into a deficit, while the United States, after nine years of successive deficits, succeeded in 1968 in having a small surplus, but do you know why? Because, on capital account, the United States became a recipient country by dint of borrowing Euro-dollars from the Middle East and other countries. By forbidding American subsidiaries from providing their capital from the United States but forcing them to borrow overseas, the United States achieved a surplus on capital account in 1968. Well, it is a scandal – if the richest country in the world has, in fact, to be a borrower on balance. This, in itself, seems to me to be a condemnation of the international system as we find it.

And so we certainly do face another momentous and eventful monetary year. If we do not have another 'Bretton Woods' in which a little foresight can again be exercised as it was in 1943 and 1944, we shall have to endure improvization such as we had from 1964 to 1968, with such devices as the two-tier system for gold.

What do we hope to achieve? A void is being created by the insufficiency of gold going into the monetary reserves and by the fact that the reserve currencies themselves are slowly fading out of their role as reserve currencies – not as working currencies because we shall always need sterling and the dollar as international trading currencies – but I think their role as reserve currencies is definitely waning.

Filling the gap

What is going to fill the gap? Will it be special deposit receipts, namely, the paper gold which is to be issued probably sometime this year by the International Monetary Fund? The answer to that, I think, is 'yes', provided that this latest invention is not seen to be yet another device for financing chronic deficits of other countries. If it is seen to be that, if it is seen to be another way of financing a United States or a United Kingdom persistent balance of payments deficit, then I do not think the other countries will be prepared to play ball. They have, in fact, inserted in the SDR agreement a clause which gives them the option not to participate.

If it is seen that the new device which is to be activated sometime this year is merely operated in that way, then I would say that this new scheme will have at best a two years' run and may founder even before that.

What is needed, if we look to the immediate future, is first, a realignment of some of the major currency parities. Some currencies are obviously under-valued – the D-mark is one of those. Some are obviously over-valued – and the French franc is, perhaps, the weakest link in the chain in that respect although it is not a particularly vulnerable link because the French franc is still essentially a domestic currency and there are not large amounts of French francs held outside France which can be flung speculatively on the exchange market. Some realignment is needed.

Secondly, a greater measure of flexibility in exchange rates. I am not an adherent of floating rates of exchange; people who suggest floating have obviously never learnt how to swim, because they don't know the difference between floating and sinking! In existing circumstances, a truly floating rate for sterling would not be practicable and this would apply to a good many other currencies. Floating rates will have to be very severely controlled. I would prefer to see a greater margin, a greater tolerance, of fluctuation between the new parities which are going to be fixed later this year.

And, finally, what we also need is a better adjustment mechanism; a mechanism under which the countries in surplus or in deficit adjust their domestic policies in accordance with their balance of payments. With all its faults the gold standard did, in fact, provide the kind of impersonal discipline which is followed because it is impersonal; because the traffic signals given by movements of gold were automatically heeded by the countries which adhered to the system.

In this context we should elevate gold to a slightly greater position of responsibility. It should not be master but should be the policeman. It is not the relic of a barbarous age, as Keynes called it. For a time I am convinced it has a very important role to play. I am doubtful myself whether it can play that role at the present price of 35 dollars an ounce.

Above all, we have to return to a reasonable equilibrium in balances of payments. Without that, no international monetary system can possibly function. If there is no discipline of this kind, then the only result must be anarchy in the international monetary system, tempered perhaps by improvised holding operations, swap facilities between central banks and the rest of it.

Damaging alternative

The great danger – the alternative which faces us – is that if we do not tackle this particular problem on the very broad lines which I have had to indicate in the short time available to me, the alternative to that could well be 'each man for himself', or 'each country for itself', seeking refuge in defensive protectionist postures which would be highly damaging to world prosperity and certainly have grave restrictive effects on world trade. This is unlikely to happen. I think that human intelligence would be sufficient to realize this danger and to avert it. However we deal with the monetary problem, there is one certainty in this uncertain world; that given the basic philosophy expounded by Keynes at Bretton Woods, namely, the primacy of domestic policy, we shall endure – suffer or enjoy, according to taste – continuing inflation, continuing erosion in the value of money. However we solve the international monetary problem, I think that in purely national terms we are going to live with inflation as long as the eye can see. The only uncertainty about that proposition is, at what rate?

Well, this is a problem on which I would like to start all over again. It is obviously a problem of immense relevance to the craft of chartered accountants. It is of immense relevance to us all, be it in investment terms or in the way in which we plan our future life.

Finance and Commerce

'See Note 1'

EVEN before the reader of the accounts of Dennis Brothers Ltd, which form this week's reprint, gets down to reading he is advised – almost ordered – to 'See Note 1'. This instruction comes before anything else in every account and the reader who 'sees Note 1' is thereupon directed to 'Note 3' after which he will turn to the auditors' report. So if readers of 'Finance and Commerce' care to go through that procedure, the rest of this commentary will be better understood.

In the 1966–67 accounts Note 2 stated that stock and work in progress was based on an evaluation of the physical quantities in hand or on records which were the subject of perpetual inventory. The valuation, it was stated, had been arrived at by methods considered appropriate in the circumstances of the company and its subsidiaries after making such provisions as were deemed necessary.

Stores and stock accounting records, shareholders were told by the chairman, Mr Alan R. Stewart, were in a much tidier shape, and continuous stock audit introduced the previous year had allowed the exercise of better control.

In his statement with the 1967–68 accounts, Mr Stewart comments that at September 30th, 1967, the auditors were satisfied, after investigation, with the statement of the company's stocks. Physical stock-taking of work in progress was conducted on August 30th, 1968, and when added to the figures taken from stock records disclosed an all-over stock deficiency of £114,000 compared with the figure of £2,116,788 shown in the accounts.

Error in stock-taking

The board, Mr Stewart says, 'is firmly of the opinion that the discrepancy is due to an error in the stock-taking arising from a failure to count in certain stocks incorrectly booked off stock sheets whilst still in store, and this in turn was occasioned by a change in the recording system and the fact that considerable quantities of stock were then being moved in connection with the factory reorganization'. The directors have accordingly based the accounts on the position shown in the management accounts and Mr Stewart makes the point that it is, of course, not now possible to recheck stocks as at the end of August in view of the large movements which have taken place since.

Dennis Brothers, of Guildford, are specialized commercial vehicle manufacturers: fire engines, refuse collection vehicles, ambulances and so on. In recent years the company has been through a range of boardroom and works reorganization troubles, the latest stock difference coming, disappointingly, on top of the company's failure to meet earnings forecasts. Profits were back from £181,590 to £105,200, with dividend halved at 5 per cent; whereas at the half-year mark profits were only some £8,100 down and a maintained 10 per cent dividend rate, on capital increased by the issue of 456,250 shares by way of rights at 16*s* 6*d* a share, was considered well within the company's capacity. In fact, the rights issue was made on such a dividend forecast.

Disruption

Turnover, as the profit and loss account shows, was increased and the chairman gives three basic reasons why profits moved in the opposite direction. In the first instance, factory replanning disturbed production; inflation of wage and material costs followed devaluation; and production was further disrupted by 'the almost simultaneous introduction of a number of new models'.

Factory modernization was 'expedited due to the need for space for the Cochran project', the chairman reports, and instructs readers to 'see below'. 'Seeing below' is an operation which suggests that space for the Cochran project is not now a pressing need. The company had planned to develop, manufacture and sell units based on Cochran designs for ground support equipment which Cochran had evolved for dealing with all types of civil aircraft.

Last October, Cochran was taken over by Western Gear Corporation which already has UK and European connections and, Mr Stewart says, 'this has caused us to withdraw (by amicable arrangement) from our agreement with Cochran on terms which avoided any trading loss'. He assures shareholders that sales of the current range of Mercury Airfield products will continue to be developed.

Quite apart from the Cochran point, however, there was extensive resiting of main stores, engineering, paint shop, drawing office and other departments and, inevitably, it all cost more than expected.

On the new product side, a new all-purpose 15-ton chassis, a new medium duty fire-engine, a larger capacity refuse vehicle and a revolutionary front wheel drive ambulance were introduced. Development expenditure of £39,000 has been charged to development account and the intention is to write this off over three years.

By divisions

Management has been divisionalized by products in all stages subsequent to the production of the chassis, and a new manager has joined the company to take charge of all manufacture up to the chassis completion. The problems of divisionalizing accounts in line with management responsibilities, of strengthening the stock control system and integration of these systems with production control, purchasing and costing 'are receiving active attention'.

Mr Stewart is confident that, despite the 1967–68 setback, and despite internal changes which he admits will continue to affect operations in the current year, the company 'will continue its recovery'. Although over the past two years production output has risen by 30 per cent, outstanding orders at the financial year-end were still 11 per cent up on the figure twelve months earlier. 'That trend', the chairman says, 'indicates that the planned growth of our marketing operation is coming to fruition'.

(b) Freehold Land and Factory at Guildford.

A professional valuation of the Company's Freehold Land and Factory at Guildford as at 31st March 1965 amounted to £1,213,500. The valuation is comparable with £86,204, the amount at which the Freehold Land and Factory at Guildford was included in the books at that date. At 30th September 1968 the net book amount was £193,438.

(c) Outstanding Commitments for Capital Expenditure were as follows:

(d) Depreciation and Investment Grants

No depreciation has been provided on the Company's Freehold Houses and Factory at Guildford since 30th September, 1958.

Depreciation on Plant, Machinery and Equipment (including the amortisation of Jigs, Tools and Patterns) is provided on a basis which will reduce the Balance Sheet amount to estimated realisable value at the end of the working life of the plant, machinery and equipment concerned, such basis being applied consistently.

Depreciation is calculated before deducting Investment Grants, a proportion of which is credited to Profit and Loss Account annually in relation to the depreciation charged on the appropriate assets. Investment Grants estimated to be receivable to 30th September, 1968, less amounts taken to the credit of Profit and Loss Account, gives £78,007, which has been deducted from Fixed Assets.

3. Stock and Work-in-Progress

The Company

A physical count of work-in-progress was made at 31st August, 1968, and this together with stockholdings based on stores records was evaluated on a basis consistent, so far as possible, with that adopted in arriving at the Balance Sheet amount at 30th September, 1967.

The evaluation prepared with the aid of a computer bureau but based on information supplied by the Company has revealed a significant discrepancy when compared with the amount carried in the books computed in accordance with the cost accounting procedures of the Company. An investigation into the discrepancy would seem to indicate that there could be significant errors in the basic quantities of stockholdings as shown on the Stores records at 31st August, 1968.

Because of this, pending a further evaluation which will take place when the Directors are satisfied that the underlying records are accurate, the Directors have included as the book amount of Stock and Work-in-Progress an amount arrived at in accordance with the cost accounting procedures of the Company, after taking into account the utilisation of provisions at 30th September, 1967, for the purpose for which they were made.

Subsidiary Companies

Stock and Work-in-Progress is based on the lower of cost or estimated net realisable value and the basis is consistent with that adopted at 30th September, 1967.

4. Development Expenditure

The amount of £39,000 carried forward in the Balance Sheet represents an assessment by the Directors of exceptional expenditure incurred during the year to 30th September, 1968, on new types of vehicles. It is proposed to write this amount off over 3 years.

(e) The 1967 provision took account of the benefit of losses amounting to £94,648 brought forward from a previous year.

AUDITORS' REPORT to the Members of Dennis Brothers Limited

An adjustment will be required to the book amount of stock and work in progress shown in the balance sheets on pages [201 and 202], arising from the statements made in Note 3 to the accounts. The group profit before and after taxation for the year ended 30th September, 1968, is subject to such adjustment relative to the stock and work in progress at that date as may be considered to be attributable thereto when the result of a further stock evaluation taking into account all relevant factors is ascertained.

Subject to this, in our opinion, the accounts, read in conjunction with and subject to the Notes, set out on pages [202 and 203] give, in all other respects, a true and fair view of the state of affairs at 30th September, 1968, and comply with the Companies Acts 1948 and 1967.

CITY NOTES

SOMETHING approaching defiance of the Bank of England by the Committee of the London Clearing Banks, and the reference to the Monopolies Commission of the Unilever-Allied Breweries and Rank Organisation-De La Rue mergers may possibly achieve what some other Government and quasi-government action has so far failed to accomplish – a lowering of stock-market temperature.

Defiance from the Clearing Banks followed the Bank of England demand that the £150 million of excess bank lending must come off the total of bank loans by the end of March. The Bank of England view is that the banks have not done all they could to reduce existing loans as distinct from cutting back new lending. One bank in particular is officially considered to have dragged its feet in this respect.

But such matters apart, the authorities insist on the letter as well as the spirit of the squeeze and in that insistence there seems to be something else besides the substance of a Bank of England directive. There would appear to be a broader authoritative view that somehow speculative money – or the creation of it – will have to be stopped.

It is not suggested that the £150 million of bank lending above the stipulated March maximum is, in fact, speculative, but the presence of the surplus can be taken as an indication, to a much wider audience than the banks' customers, that credit restrictions of all kinds are merely necessary evils which are the price of, rather than a brake on, business development.

* * * *

CERTAINLY the stock-market has ignored credit restrictions as anything of a hindrance to the cult of the equity or to the development of take-over business. Heavy share market buying concerned with take-over battles is, by general assumption, financed with bank money. And the Board of Trade Monopoly Commission reference moves have been clearly designed to attempt to damp down merger activity which was in obvious danger of becoming extreme and illogical.

The appreciation of share values has created fresh investment and speculative money on a considerable scale. There is room very much to doubt whether the equity market would be at its present pitch but for the extreme level of take-over activity.

The Board of Trade's move is not necessarily an industrial action. It is an economic action. If Government action can forestall mergers for the time being and thereby remove a major supporting factor from the stock-market, then the market's capacity to manufacture speculative funds will be reduced.

Similarly, if the banks can be forced into taking the final – and admittedly the most difficult and most severe – action in reducing the level of lending, then there may have to be considerable realization of investments for bank loan repayments because the impression is that the bank screw will have to be put on favoured customers who habitually – but unnecessarily – operate on bank overdrafts.

* * * *

ANY such realization of investments is likely, admittedly, to harm the gilt-edged market more than it is likely to harm equities. But it might not necessarily be harmful if it forces the gilt-edged market down to a level which even the most rabid equity follower is forced to admit as attractive.

If, by referring mergers to the Monopolies Commission, the Government does take the steam out of mergers then the steam could well come out of the equity section as a whole. Obviously this is a touchy situation at a time when there is acknowledgement of the need for industrial rationalization but not necessarily a need for mergers for mergers' sake.

The Board of Trade, if it is to continue with its cooling-off period policy, will have to distinguish between necessary and unnecessary merger operations. That should not be too difficult. The Industrial Reorganization Corporation should be able to give the Board of Trade the necessary advice.

In Parliament

Betterment Levy: Yield

Mr HOWIE asked the Minister of Housing and Local Government what he expects the yield of the betterment levy to be in the current year.

Mr K. ROBINSON: The Land Commission have already collected nearly £6 million in betterment levy during the current financial year, and indications are that they will achieve their estimate of £8·3 million. Levy assessments issued in 1968–69 should reach £15 million.

Close Company Legislation

Mr KENNETH BAKER asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he is considering for the reform of close company legislation.

Mr DIAMOND: A large number of proposals were recently discussed between the Inland Revenue and representatives of commerce and industry. I am now considering them.

Hansard, January 28th, 1969. Written answers, col. 272.

Value Added Tax

Mr BARNETT asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what estimate he has made of the number of Civil Servants required and the administrative cost of introducing a value added tax covering the same range of goods to which the tax is applicable in France and Germany, details of which are available to him through international sources;

(2) if he will give the comparison of the estimated cost of collecting the same amount by a valued added tax as is at present collected by selective employment tax;

(3) if he will give the comparison of the estimated cost of collecting the same amount by a value added tax as is at present collected by purchase tax.

Mr HAROLD LEVER: The number of staff and administrative cost required to operate a valued added tax would depend on its form and coverage, on which policy and practice varies from country to country. But the extra staff would have to run into several thousands and the corresponding administrative cost would necessarily be much higher than for purchase tax or selective employment tax.

Hansard, January 29th, 1969. Written answers, col. 344.

Redundancy Payments

Mr RIDLEY asked the Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity what is the current annual cost of redundancy payments from the redundancy fund and from employers, respectively.

Mr HATTERSLEY: On the basis of expenditure in the last six months of 1968 the current annual rate of redundancy payments met by the redundancy fund is £47,796,000 and by employers £16,052,000.

Mr RIDLEY asked the Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity what is the total cost, and what is the total number of payments made, from the redundancy fund, from its inception to date.

Mr HATTERSLEY: The total cost of payments from the redundancy fund from December 6th, 1965, to December 31st, 1968, was £138,642,000 in respect of 653,168 payments.

Hansard, January 29th, 1969. Written answers, col. 345.

Income Tax

Mr BARNETT asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the reduction of revenue in 1969–70 arising from a cut in the standard rate of tax on earned income only by 6*d*; and what estimate he has made of the reduction in revenue arising from a cut in the reduced rates on earned income by 6*d*.

Mr HAROLD LEVER: On the assumption that earned income was treated as the bottom slice of a mixed income, about £110 million and £140 million respectively for 1968–69, the latest year for which estimates are available.

Mr BOYD-CARPENTER asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the next £1,000 of his earnings above £5,000, £8,500, £10,000 and £15,000 a year is now retained by a married man with two children under 11 years of age; and what are the comparable figures at current rates of exchange by a similar man after payment of direct taxation in the United States, France, West Germany, and Japan, based on information he derives from international organizations.

Mr TAVERNE: I will, with permission, circulate a table in the Official Report:

TABLE

(3) Standard expenses deductions have been taken into account in the calculation.

(4) National, prefectural and municipal income taxes are included in the deductions. The figures are for the 1968–69 tax year.

Taxation Case

A full report of the case summarized in this column will be published, with Notes on the Judgment, in the 'Annotated Tax Cases'

Earlham Colour Studios Ltd v. Minister of Labour

In the High Court of Justice (Queen's Bench Division)

(Before the Lord Chief Justice (Lord PARKER OF WADDINGTON), Mr Justice ASHWORTH and Mr Justice WILLIS).

Selective employment tax – Refund – Premium – Printing – Or preparatory to printing – Montage-making for customers – Illustrated advertising matter – Customer instructs blockmaker – Whether printing and allied activities – Whether commercial photography – Whether professional services – Selective Employment Payments Act 1966, section 1 (2) – Minimum list headings, 489, 829, 899.

The company's activities consisted of making montages, from which blocks for illustrations for advertisements were made. The company employed three process photographers, two artists, a copier, the printer of the photographs, a progress chaser or receptionist, and a messenger. The customers were mainly advertisers and advertising agencies. Sometimes the customer sent a rough design or ideas for a design, and sometimes requested that a design be made. The design was produced by the company and submitted to the customer; and if it was approved, photographs were taken, and the artists prepared lettering to go with the photograph. Further photographs were then taken and made up on a film sheet to form a montage. It was from the montage that the block was prepared. The customer made his own arrangements with the blockmaker.

It was contended for the company that its activities were under minimum list heading 489, in that they were comprised in the description 'Printing . . . and allied industries'. For the Minister it was contended that the appropriate minimum list heading was heading 899.2, 'Commercial . . . photography'. The Industrial Tribunal decided (1) that the company's activities formed work preparatory to printing and were not under heading 489; (2) that they came under heading 899.2, 'Commercial photography'.

Held: the Tribunal's decision at (1) was correct, and it was not necessary to decide whether the company's work was under heading 899.2 or under heading 879, 'Professional and scientific services'.

London Students' President's Meeting

THE attendance was disappointingly small at the annual President's Meeting of the Chartered Accountant Students' Society of London held in Guildhall on Monday of last week. The meeting was presided over by Mr E. Kenneth Wright, M.A., F.C.A., a Vice-President of the Society, in the absence of the President, Mr G. R. Appleyard, F.C.A., who was recovering from illness.

This year's meeting was convened to discuss 'Integration and future plans', and Mr Wright observed in his opening remarks that it was unfortunate there appeared to be so few students (there were less than 100 present) who appreciated that they too were vitally involved in the scheme now before the profession.

Speaking in support of the scheme were Mr W. E. Parker, C.B.E., F.C.A., a Vice-President of the Society and Past-President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, and Mr A. H. Walton, M.A., F.C.A., a member of the Council of the Institute and chairman of the Education Committee. The speakers opposing the scheme were Mr Bruce Sutherland, F.C.A., and Mr Hugh T. Nicholson, F.C.A.

Sir Harold Gillett, Bt, M.C., F.C.A., a Vice-President of the Society, welcomed the members to Guildhall and the President of the Institute, Mr Stanley Dixon, M.A., F.C.A., addressed the meeting at the conclusion of the discussion. A vote of thanks to Mr Wright and the guest speakers was proposed by Miss Ann Dent, chairman of the Committee of the Society.

About ten students participated in the debate but – as at the qualified members' meetings held throughout the country in recent months – reporting of the discussion has been prohibited.

THE ACCOUNTANTS' CHRISTIAN FELLOWSHIP

Annual Dinner

Mr Ernest Shippam, managing director of the well-known Shippam Paste company, was the speaker at the recent annual dinner of The Accountants' Christian Fellowship. The chairman, Mr D. H. E. Khan, F.C.A., presided and there were about 115 members and guests present.

Mr Shippam gave many instances of the effect of Christianity upon himself, and he described the lively part it can play in business life generally. In at least one case he had found how much more he could help somebody in distress in prayer because it came unexpectedly from the managing director rather than from the vicar. There was inevitably a lot of criticism to be met in the factory and elsewhere, but in the toughest men there was a basic need. They would not say so under any circumstances but they would accept often the Christian attitude in others and be glad to respond to it if only the Christian would put aside his fears and speak out. Prayer should be given full scope in industry, said Mr Shippam, for there was the power and the guidance of God behind it. To secure attention it was important that the Christian's own work in the business should be of the best – that his craftsmanship and his determination should be esteemed.

To such a gathering of accountants Mr Shippam offered an assessment of what, he suggested, was the real profit in business – first, profitableness to the major asset of any business, those who work in it; second, profitableness to its customers; third (and this would follow automatically) profitableness to the shareholders. To this end the Christian should take everybody's interest seriously. He should seek not who was right but what was right. But what about the difficulties? The Christian did not cease to be a wrongdoer himself but he was a wrongdoer whose mistakes had been paid for on the Cross. A God who would go that far could surely be relied upon to guide and support the Christian to any extent he needed.

US ECONOMIC PROBLEMS

With proposed measures of fiscal restraint delayed by legislative difficulties and a substantial increase in military spending, the United States economy grew rapidly during the first half of 1968 according to a survey by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development for 1968–69 (HMSO, price 5*s* 6*d*).

Over the first two quarters the gross national product rose at an annual rate of 6·4 per cent. Although expansion remained strong in the third quarter there are, states the survey, indications of a cooling-off in the final months of the year influenced by the fiscal programme enacted in June.

On the outlook for 1969, the report makes plain the costs which can be involved when fiscal decisions are delayed. With increased fiscal restraint, the first half of 1969 should see a marked easing of demand pressures. Growth of demand in the second half of this year whilst both likely and appropriate will, the survey warns, none the less need to be kept within moderation through appropriate fiscal policies.

Part I of the survey reviews the sources and consequences of the expansion in the first part of 1968, measures taken to restrict it and prospects for better stability in 1969. Part II deals with the balance of payments problem, while Part III summarizes the main conclusions and the economic problems likely to be faced by the new Administration.

6½% Girl.

She knows where the interest is. She's found it. In the safest possible way. In an Investment Account.

For a start, there's the big interest. Which has grown steadily all the time. From 5½% to 6%, and now to today's figure of 6½% per annum. And she can save whatever she wants. So long as she deposits at least £1 at a time. Up to a maximum of £5,000.

She had £50 in an Ordinary Account, and so qualified to open an Investment Account. If she had not had an Ordinary Account she could easily have opened one first. At any of the 22,000 Savings Bank Post Offices throughout the country.

Withdrawals are simplicity itself. She simply gives us a month's notice, and we'll have her money waiting at any Savings Bank Post Office. With interest. Which we pay without deduction. Though it is taxable.

Here's another point of interest. Savings Bank Post Offices stay open when other banks close. Even on Saturdays. So her banking is that much easier.

Absolute security, and six and a half per cent. That's her kind of interest. How about your clients? An Investment Account is the perfect answer to certain kinds of investment problems.

Ask for a leaflet at your local Post Office.

Bedtime Reading for the Chancellor

IN the past five years total taxation in the United Kingdom has risen from nearly £10,000 million to over £15,000 million. Expressed as a share of the gross national product, this represents an increase from 33 per cent to 42 per cent. According to a recent study, Taxation, by the Industrial Policy Group,[1] 'taxation is at an unprecedented peace-time level both absolutely and as a proportion of the gross national product'.

The IPG asserts that the outstanding fact of the British taxation system is that redistribution from high to low incomes is a very minor part of its effect, although it is held out as one of its major purposes. But, adds the Group, there is the far more important loss to the economy arising from the disincentives to work, save, and take risks, caused by present taxes.

A fundamental pre-condition for the reform of the UK fiscal system as well as for the healthy growth of the economy, states the IPG booklet, is the reduction in government expenditure. It states that over a decade, given an annual rate of increase in the gross national product of $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 per cent, a reduction in the standard rate of income tax from 8*s* 3*d* to 4*s* would be possible. The Group does not ask for actual cuts in government expenditure, but requires the Chancellor to keep to current levels. The increase in GNP over the next decade would thus be available entirely for the benefit of the private sector of the economy.

The IPG proposals for converting the accretion to the GNP into tax savings certainly make attractive reading. Surtax rates and scales would be modified in two ways: first, the slabs of income to which the successive rates apply would be expanded, while the surtax rates would reach a maximum of 6*s* on income over £25,000.

The Group asserts that the arguments in favour of the corporation tax are 'superficially persuasive'. It contends that opinion in the USA has moved against the principle of separate taxation of corporate profits, while France and Germany have both substantially modified this style of corporate tax. The Group recognizes that it would be impracticable to go back to the old style of company taxation; but would be satisfied if the Confederation of British Industry's proposal were adopted, whereby corporate profits pay tax at a uniform rate with dividend paid net of the standard rate of income tax. In other words, there would no longer be double taxation of distributed profits.

The present system of investment grants finds no favour with the IPG, which believes that the previous system of investment allowances was free from all the defects which arise with the grants. It is suggested that the former investment allowances should be restored because, taken with the Group's proposals for taxing profits, this would leave the direct cash flow to manufacturing industry roughly unchanged, provided the grants were to be at the same time abolished. Furthermore, the investment allowances helped to rectify the effects of historic cost depreciation.

Turning to capital gains tax, the Group recommends the American definition of short-term tax, i.e. six months, and it would abolish the long-term capital gains tax on the ground that estate duty in a period of inflation imposes a sufficiently severe burden on taxpayers. The existing estate duty is, however, largely self-defeating, hence there should be a reduction in its weight and the adoption of the 'slab' system, together with its extension to dispositions, inter vivos, might well leave its yield unchanged.

Other proposals for reform put forward in a new PEP booklet Personal Taxation, Incentives and Tax Reform, by C. V. Brown and D. A. Dawson,[2] are far more complicated and novel than those of the IPG. They involve a recasting of the entire structure of welfare and tax payments on the grounds that any reform of the tax system must be linked with the reform in the structure of welfare benefits. To this extent the booklet provides the basis for longer-term reform.

It is not so much the contrasting proposals which differentiate these two approaches to Britain's fiscal problems. Rather it is the authors' attitudes and objectives. For the IPG, economic efficiency is the chief criterion, based on the assumption that tax incentives will result in greater productivity. For the PEP authors, it is the redistribution of income and capital for purposes of reducing disparities in living standards that is all important. While they concede that the elimination of the highest rates of surtax would be a useful reform, the main argument for it is not that it might remove a disincentive, but that it would kill off what they describe as the 'over-taxation myth'. This would be accompanied by measures to maintain the total tax burden on the rich, either by substituting a wealth tax for surtax or by broadening the tax base by bringing in gifts and long-term capital gains. Another possibility is greater discrimination between investment and earned income.

Certainly Mr Jenkins has no lack of bedtime reading in preparing for Budget day.

Investment Grants Under Fire

A DEBATE in the House of Commons on the Consolidated Fund Bill last week provided an opportunity to question the supplementary estimate of £45 million for investment grants under the Industrial Development Act 1966. These cash subsidies toward the provision of new machinery and plant were, of course, introduced to replace the old investment allowances, following the defeat of the Inland Revenue in Hinton v. Maden & Ireland Ltd (38 ATC 231).

The new system was attacked in the House on all sides. Opening the debate, Mr A. P. Costain criticized the booklet Investment Grants: A Guide for Industry, issued by the Board of Trade and which was hastily revised following the High Court decision in British Oxygen Co Ltd v. Board of Trade ([1968] TR 113). He said the booklet gave no real information at all because it had no legal force; moreover, it contained the warning that it would be revised from time to time in the light of experience.

Turning to the differential rate of grant for development areas, Mr Costain pointed out that builders of motorways would find their machinery passing in and out of development areas all the time. Again, when the Ministry of Public Building and Works urged builders to install heating equipment so that their men could continue working in cold weather and the builders complied, they were then refused grant on the grounds that the heating equipment was 'welfare' expenditure.

Mr Nicholas Ridley observed that plant and machinery were used in capital intensive industries where the employment offered was comparatively lower. Development areas, however, needed more opportunities for employment itself. It was, therefore, illogical to give a higher rate of grant in a development area.

He went on to criticize the apparent inability of the Civil Servants to forecast the cost of the scheme with any degree of accuracy. The original estimate for 1967–68 was £166 million. A summer supplementary in that year added a further £60 million and a winter supplementary yet another £89 million, making the first year total of £315 million, against the £166 million. This year the cost would be £425 million – nearly three times the original estimate. All this was raised by taxing companies which did not get grants as well as those which did.

Mr Kenneth Baker made the point that although the new scheme was supposed to encourage investment in new machinery and plant, the statistics indicated no such increase. In replying to the debate Mr Edmund Dell, Minister of State, Board of Trade, said that one had to consider how much less investment there would have been without the grants. The system had substantial advantages. The fact that it was a cash grant was of great psychological importance.

Mr Baker made a devastating attack on the system, saying that it discriminated against the efficient; it discriminated against service industries; and it discriminated against labour-intensive industries. How, he asked, could the Minister justify a system which allowed a company in the Highlands to take £400,000 from the Exchequer because it had bought a £1 million computer which might give employment to about six people, whereas a company in southern England which spent £1 million on building an efficient distribution or warehousing complex got nothing.

There was an odd quirk in the fact that one member criticized the refusal of investment allowances on lasts used by shoe manufacturers. It was the very fact that a shoe manufacturer was able to establish a claim for investment allowance on such small items which gave rise to the decision to replace that allowance by discretionary grants. Paragraph 8 of the booklet issued by the Board of Trade states categorically that 'Grants will not be given on any individual item less than £25'. Then, paragraph 65 says that items of machinery or plant costing less than £25 each 'will be excluded from the scope of the grants'. Finally, paragraph 67 states, inter alia, that 'Grants will not be paid on individual items of machinery or plant costing less than £25 each. If a claim is made for a number of similar items costing less than £25 each, but more than £25 in the aggregate, they will still not be eligible for grant'. Nowhere, however, in the Act itself is there anything about £25.

The Minister refused to be drawn on this topic, arguing that it was raised in the British Oxygen case and therefore was still sub judice, the appeal of the Board of Trade having been heard and judgment reserved. Nevertheless, in the face of members' criticism, and particularly the concern of the Estimates Committee that no research has been undertaken into the incentive effect of the grants, the Minister said the Government intended to institute an inquiry to try to assess the effectiveness of the investment grant system.

CBI Budget Views

THE annual representations by the Confederation of British Industry to the Chancellor of the Exchequer invariably merit attention since they reflect the views of those who are most affected by taxation, i.e., industry and its leaders. In Budget 1969 (15*s*), the CBI proposals recently put to the Chancellor are developed in pamphlet form. This provides, first, a review of the major taxes which are in need of reform, while a second part contains the technical representations.

It is noteworthy that like the Industrial Policy Group's proposals, discussed in a leading article on other pages, the CBI stresses the merits of reducing Government expenditure on the grounds that this is a more effective means of restraining consumption than is taxation. The CBI is concerned at the discrimination against investment income which, over a broad range of income, is taxed between 40 and 60 per cent more than earned income. It recommends that for estate duty the present aggregation to determine rate of duty payable should be replaced by the slab basis as used for surtax.

With over 400,000 close companies in existence, the CBI is also much concerned about the remuneration of directors permitted under the present Acts, 'the distribution of profits (i.e., shortfall) and the treatment of interest paid to directors. It contends that most manufacturing close companies seek to achieve a gross profit of about 15 to 20 per cent on capital employed. After corporation tax this is cut to 9 to 12 per cent, and existing legislation which compels distribution further whittles down the retained profits to between 3 and 5 per cent on capital employed. This is clearly excessive, and can be virtually confiscatory.

On investment incentives the CBI wants to see the effectiveness of the present investment grants improved by extending the range of eligible assets. At the same time it recommends that the Board of Trade should adopt a more liberal interpretation of the provisions of the Industrial Development Act. It also wants to see the borderline service industries eligible for investment grants. In common with many other critics the CBI stresses need for a general indirect tax to enable the Government to raise additional revenue.

Professional Practice

HABITS are slow to change in Britain, and those of the professions have generally remained too fixed for too long! Such are the views expressed in a new Bow Group pamphlet entitled Professional Practice: a Policy for the Professions.[1]

Author of the pamphlet is Mr Roger Freeman, a young chartered accountant. In his view, although the major professions (accountancy, architecture, estate agency and the law) enjoy a privileged position in modern society, they will only continue to do so if the best interests of the public are served through the provision of professional services with care, competence and maximum efficiency. The topic of how to encourage maximum efficiency is discussed in the light of the alternatives of greater State control and accountability on the one hand, or a greater measure of market competition on the other.

Recommendations put forward by Mr Freeman fall into six categories: registration and monopoly, structure of practices, fees, advertising, education, and public accountability. His advocacy of a new tax status by which professional firms should be allowed to defer payment of income tax and surtax, and so retain the tax due as working capital for growth; together with possible new sources of finance from non-working and non-voting members of partnerships, accords with the view put forward in a contributed article in The Accountant of January 11th.

While there are no specific recommendations pertaining to the accountancy profession as such, the author impliedly upholds accountants' non-scale fee methods by urging the Law Society, the RIBA and the RICS to work towards the abolition of their recommended (or statutory) charging scales. These should be replaced by firms' own scales or systems of charging, and in the long run, fees should be closely related to the time cost of work done. An adequate system of time costing should be introduced by all firms.

Like chartered surveyors, says Mr Freeman, individual practitioners in the legal and accountancy professions should be allowed more liberty to advertise.

Leasehold Reform: Relief for Flat-holders

THE injustice suffered by long-lease tenants under the Leasehold Reform Act 1967, to which reference has been made in several earlier issues of The Accountant, is to be remedied under the recently published Housing Bill.

When the Rent Act 1965 extended control to dwellings with rateable values up to £200 (£400 in London), lettings for 21 years or more, and lettings where the 'rent' was less than two-thirds of rateable value as at March 1965, were nevertheless excluded. To counter the action of some landlords who thereupon began to grant leases for 21 years and over to avoid rent control, the Government extended control to long leases by the introduction of section 39 of the Leasehold Reform Act.

But the Legislature entirely overlooked the position of a tenant who pays a large premium for the long-lease of a flat and accepts liability to pay a small ground-rent, plus a 'service charge' which fluctuates in accordance with a formula laid down in the lease. Where, moreover, a service charge is made, the landlord may also include the SET paid in respect of maintenance staff, with the result that with other cost increases the total payment may exceed the two-thirds of rateable value. If all these payments are 'rent', the leaseholder disposing of his flat will not be able to get his premium back without committing an offence.

On August 10th and again on November 2nd last, we took note of Ministerial promises to cure the anomaly by legislation. Now, clause 78 of the new Housing Bill cuts down the meaning of 'rent' for purposes of rent control in the following terms:

> '(1) The Rent Act 1968 shall have effect, and shall be deemed always to have had effect, as if it expressly "excluded from what is to be regarded as rent for the purposes of section 2 (1) (a) of that Act (exception of tenancy at a low rent from definition of 'protected tenancy') any amount which is expressed to be payable by way of rates or in consideration of services, repairs, maintenance, insurance or any other additional matter and is not such that it could not have been regarded by the parties as an amount so payable."
> '(2) In this section "additional matter" means any privilege or facility enjoyed by the tenant in connection with his occupancy, other than a privilege or facility requisite for the purposes of access, cold water supply or sanitary accommodation.'

New Currency Review

READERS who were interested in Mr Paul Bareau's discussion of the international monetary scene in last week's issue may like to learn of the appearance of a new bi-monthly, International Currency Review.[2] The first issue draws attention to the fact that sterling devaluation is working more slowly than expected and that, in successive speeches, Government spokesmen stressed the need for progressive improvements in the balance of payments position. The Review comments that a 14·3 per cent adjustment of sterling parity is being required to achieve considerably more than was originally intended.

In a review of the present world situation, Professor

[1] Bow Publications, 240 High Holborn, London WC1. Price 5*s*.

[2] International Currency Review, 12 Duke Street, St James's, London SW1. Subscription 12 guineas per annum.

Alan Day asserts – as did Mr Bareau – that it would be optimistic to believe that the world can avoid a renewal of severe international monetary troubles. In his opinion, devaluation of the French franc by 10 to 15 per cent would be justified, just as revaluation of the Deutschmark is required. Continuing imbalance of sterling overseas accounts is not so much due to the failure of devaluation as to the lack of sufficiently tight restraint on consumer domestic expenditure. Professor Day concludes that events and theory point towards the case for greater exchange rate flexibility.

Monetary Supply and Control

FOR some time past, on both sides of the Atlantic, there has been lively discussion as to the significance for the economy over the supply of money. To the extent that the monetary authorities lose control of the supply of money, inflationary pressures are aggravated and the recovery of the economy deferred.

A major factor in the inability of the authorities to control effectively the supply of money in recent years concerns the stabilization of interest rates. The purpose of this is to ensure that government credit does not fall too sharply and to enable the Government to borrow at reasonable rates of interest. If control of monetary policy is relaxed then an increasing burden is thrown on fiscal and budgetary policies.

These issues are considered in a stimulating Hobart Paper, Money in Boom and Slump (Institute of Economic Affairs, 7*s* 6*d*), by Professor A. W. Walters, of the London School of Economics, who examines British monetary experience since the 1880s. In the light of developments during this period he tests, partly by econometric methods, the adequacy of the conventional quantity theory of money and the more modern Keynesian theories. Perhaps the most interesting finding is the fact that, since the war, monetary and budgetary policies have often been operated in different directions at the same time.

Motor Insurance at Lloyd's

LAST week the Lloyd's market, which now has an overall annual premium income approaching £600 million, celebrated 60 years of organized motor insurance. The first motor policy is thought to have been written in 1901. Having been drafted with the help of a marine underwriter, the policy treated the insured vehicle as a ship navigating on dry land. 'Eight years later, motor underwriters at Lloyd's were required to comply with the Assurance Companies Act 1909. Comparatively few were involved in the business in those days. By 1947 there were 20 Lloyd's syndicates writing UK motor business, with total premium income of approximately £3½ million. Now there are 32 motor syndicates with a premium income of about £40 million. At least two of the syndicates each have a premium income in excess of the group total in 1947 and there are two others almost as large. As a result of this increase in business, it is now estimated that at least one private motor-car owner in five is insured at Lloyd's.

Whilst all business coming to the market must be handled by one of the 220 or so firms of Lloyd's brokers, in the past few years various arrangements have been made to cut corners and save administrative costs. As a result, many 'outside' firms of brokers have had arrangements made on their behalf by Lloyd's brokers whereby they can now deal direct with underwriters on day-to-day business, although the Lloyd's brokers are still responsible for the payment of the accounts. One effect of this saving of administrative expense is that the Lloyd's broker receives no more than nominal brokerage, the rest going to the introducing broker.

Having proved that this kind of arrangement can succeed, it is quite likely that it will be extended to other classes of business since premium rates charged by underwriters are often lower than those quoted in the company market.

Facts and Figures on Motor Manufacturing

OVER the period 1958–67, car production in Britain increased from just over 1 million to some 1·5 million. Of this output more than half in 1967 and in recent years has been concentrated in the 1001–1600 cc capacity range. These and other interesting statistics are assembled in a new Data Book from the Economic Development Committee for motor manufacturing.

Among the other figures covering 1958–67, it seems that until 1967 the total value of exports rose continuously, although the number of cars exported declined from a peak of 679,000 in 1964 to 503,000 in 1967. It is noteworthy that over this period component exports became increasingly important and, in the last two years, exceeded the value of car exports. The value of UK exports of all types of motor vehicle and components in 1967 totalled £562 million, of which one-fifth went to EFTA and a slightly higher proportion to the USA.

Comparative data for the major exporting countries shows that Britain ranks third after Germany and France. Germany in 1967 exported over 1·3 million cars, compared with just over half a million from the UK.

The number of vehicle registrations has grown continuously, and for cars in 1967 amounted to over 1·1 million. Nearly 60 per cent of this figure was in the middle capacity range, i.e., 1001–1600 cc. Since 1958 the number of cars in use has slightly more than doubled over the ten-year period, i.e., from 4·7 million in 1958 to 10·6 million in 1967. This rate of growth – 125 per cent – was very much faster than growth in commercial vehicles, which rose over the same period from 1·4 million to 1·8 million, i.e., 25 per cent.

The seven major vehicle manufacturers had net assets in 1967 of £512 million and their total capital employed was £634 million, but the net income before tax was only £12 million. This was the worst year of any between 1960 and 1966, when net income before tax fluctuated between £30 and £100 million.

There are some 469,000 workers employed in the motor industry compared with 382,000 in 1959. Within the industry just under one-quarter are non-manual and more than three-quarters are manual workers. Of the latter group, one-third are described as skilled, and one-quarter as unskilled – the balance being semi-skilled. The average weekly hours worked by manual workers in October 1967 were 43, and their average weekly earnings amounted to just over £25 per week in that year.

THIS IS MY LIFE

Top Level Objectives

by An Industrious Accountant

FRANK, our chief internal auditor, was doing a spot of grumbling. For two years now he and his team had been spot-checking, testing controls and doing O & M work in an area which was limited at the best of times. Our systems were straightforward and uncomplicated, our security measures were adequate and efficient; within its limitations he gave the office organization a clean bill of health. Now, he wanted higher-level objectives, i.e., targets worthy of a graduate.

Frank tends to be somewhat egocentric as regards his own talents, although I don't object to a reasonable amount of superiority complex. The higher the better, I assured him, but also the higher the fewer; what did he suggest? He was the expert in a field becoming increasingly more specialized; he was the one expected to have the ideas.

Frank said he wanted to initiate a management audit. What about the company's salary and bonus scales, for example; or its long-term management replacement policy, or a dynamic management-by-objectives campaign? The theory, of course, was fine but there were practical difficulties in implementation – directors being what they were – and we got embroiled in far-ranging arguments.

Just then my secretary knocked and asked whether it was okay if she slipped off to do some personal shopping round the store. I agreed, but Frank then became somewhat acid. All these girls running round the departments all day were ruining company productivity, he complained. They broke all the standing rules, wasted their own as well as their colleagues' time, and were a so-and-so nuisance to customers. They should be disciplined, he said.

It's always a problem in a big store like ours. The staff get discounts on their purchases; and officially they're limited to the specific hours of 9 to 10 a.m. twice a week. Officially, yes, argued Frank, but in practice they rush out at any old time. They push in rudely before the customers, linger for ages over tupp'ny-ha'penny purchases and flirt with the only-too-willing salesmen. The rot should be stopped.

It seemed necessary to explain that my own secretary never transgressed. She'd had a perfectly reasonable concession as she had been swamped with rush work at the prescribed period. They all say that, Frank observed morosely, and he talked about the need for discipline with the air of a man who only sees it as applicable to somebody else.

While I was considering the need to tear him off a strip, his good intentions being the only extenuating circumstance, he suggested briskly that he'd like to get this staff shopping set-up debugged – pending homing-in on those higher objectives, of course.

It would be a change in the usual routine and would show the more obtuse general staff how much internal audit could help them. Perhaps four permitted hours instead of two; perhaps minimum purchase limits; perhaps order forms instead of personal visits? Think of the man-hours, duplicate vouchers, and punch-card hardware time, that were wasted crediting the personal ledger accounts and making weekly deductions from pay instead of insisting on cash down?

I wasn't too keen. This was a human problem rather than a systems one. There were also protocol implications. The sales manager would have reservations, and the staff association, and the office manager, to say nothing of the personnel director. . . .

Frank reassured me nonchalantly. Not to worry; he'd be tactful; he'd learned how to handle chaps the hard way, if the dimwits were at all reasonable. Besides, it would accrue to everybody's benefit to iron out the snags. Anyhow he wouldn't prejudge the issue; he'd play it by ear more than carefully; just let his boys get their teeth into it!

Well, the eggheads preach delegation, and letting 'em learn by making mistakes, and trust your subordinates' judgement, so I acquiesced. Four days later Prinny summoned me majestically to his office where were gathered the sales manager, the office manager, three senior supervisors – and Frank; all seven dimwits showing themselves indignant, argumentative, self-righteous and clearly far from reasonable.

Perhaps Frank should have been restricted to top level objectives after all.

Capital Gains on Marketable Securities

by J. D. HANSON, LL.B., F.C.A.

TWO matters which are of frequent occurrence but which are liable to cause some difficulty in computing capital gains or losses in the case of marketable securities are the questions of part disposals, and company reorganizations, take-over bids, etc. These two situations are examined in this article, which is mainly concerned with long-term capital gains, although a brief mention is made at the end of the short-term position where the transaction falls within Case VII of Schedule D.

Part disposals

The basic rule for calculating the proportion of original cost to be set against the proceeds on a part disposal of an asset is, of course, the $\frac{A}{A+B}$ formula, where A is the consideration received for the part disposal, and B is the market value of the part remaining (Finance Act 1965, Schedule 6, paragraph 7). In the case of assets such as marketable securities, however, to which the pooling principle set out in paragraph 2 of Schedule 7 of the Finance Act 1965 applies the $\frac{A}{A+B}$ calculation is normally not necessary in the event of a part disposal, as the same result is achieved by apportioning the original cost pro rata to the number of shares etc. involved. This is illustrated below:

Assume 10,000 shares acquired at 20*s* each ..	10,000
Market value at time of sale 30*s*, 2,500 shares sold for	3,750
Proportion of original cost deductible applying the $\frac{A}{A+B}$ formula:
$\frac{3,750}{3,750+11,250} \times £10,000$	2,500
Chargeable gain	£1,250

which can be short-circuited thus:

Amount received on disposal	3,750
Proportion of cost deductible:
$\frac{2,500}{10,000} \times £10,000$	2,500
Gain as above	£1,250

The $\frac{A}{A+B}$ calculation is only necessary in the case of capital distributions, which are treated as part disposals (Finance Act 1965, Schedule 7, paragraph 3 (1)), and even here sub-paragraph 2 provides a de minimis rule whereby a small distribution can be deducted from the cost of the shares, thus avoiding an immediate charge to capital gains tax. For this purpose the Inland Revenue have indicated in their booklet Capital Gains Tax (CGT8, November 1968 – para. 126) that they will normally regard a sum which does not exceed 5 per cent of the value of the asset to which it relates as falling within the de minimis category.

It should be borne in mind that a capital distribution is any distribution (including a distribution in a liquidation) which is not an income distribution (Finance Act 1965, Schedule 7, paragraph 3 (4)). Capital distributions are deemed to arise in such circumstances as a dividend received by a non-dealing company out of pre-acquisition profits (Finance Act 1965, section 65 (3)), a cash receipt in the course of a reorganization (Finance Act 1965, Schedule 7, paragraph 4 (4)), and where rights issues are sold (Finance Act 1966, Schedule 10, paragraph 8).

Where there have been part disposals of shares held at April 6th, 1965, either before or after that date, then the pooling principle does not apply except in the case of quoted securities in respect of which an election has been made under Schedule 11, Finance Act 1968. In other cases, in order to identify the shares remaining, the first-in, first-out rule operates – for unquoted securities by virtue of the Finance Act 1965, Schedule 6, paragraph 26, and for quoted securities not covered by a Schedule 11 election by virtue of the Finance Act 1965, Schedule 6, paragraph 22 (6), as applied by the Finance Act 1968, section 32 (5). Having thus matched purchases and sales, part disposals of an individual purchase can be dealt with by apportioning the cost pro rata.

Company mergers, reorganization, etc.

Reorganization and reduction of share capital etc. is dealt with in paragraphs 4 and 5 of Schedule 7, Finance Act 1965, and paragraphs 6 and 7 of that schedule apply the same rules mutatis mutandis to company amalgamations. For the purposes of paragraph 4, a reorganization occurs where persons are allotted shares or debentures in a company whether for payment or not in proportion to their existing holdings, or where there is more than one class of share and the rights attached to any class are altered. Paragraph 5 deals with the conversion of securities.

Paragraph 6 deals with cases where one company issues shares or debentures in exchange for shares or debentures of another company in the following three situations:

(1) Where the company issuing the shares or debentures will in consequence of the exchange have control over the other.

(2) Where the company issuing the shares or debentures already controls the other company.

(3) Where the company issuing the shares or debentures does so as a result of a general offer to the members of the other company, which was in the first instance conditional on acceptances sufficient to give the offeror company control of the offeree company.

Paragraph 7 deals with cases where one company issues shares or debentures to the members of another company in proportion to their existing holdings, but the original holdings are not exchanged but retained or cancelled.

It will thus be seen that paragraphs 6 and 7 are appropriate to the majority of take-over bids.

The underlying principle of the legislation is that the mere exchange of paper for paper (whether shares for shares, shares and debentures for shares, or vice versa, or any such combination) does not give rise to a disposal for the purpose of capital gains tax and the shares etc. acquired (which are called 'the new holding' – Finance Act 1965, Schedule 7, paragraph 4 (1)) are treated as having been acquired at the same time and at the same price as the shares for which they were exchanged.

Where the person receiving the new holding is required to give any consideration for it, that consideration is treated as having been given for the original holding (Finance Act 1965, Schedule 7, paragraph 4 (3)). Where that person receives any consideration other than the new holding (e.g., where, on a take-over bid, there is a cash payment in addition to the shares issued by the bidder) such consideration is treated as a capital distribution (Finance Act 1965, Schedule 7, paragraph 4 (4)).

A reorganization, merger, take-over, etc., falling within these provisions may for convenience be described (following US terminology) as a tax-free reorganization, although where groups of companies are involved a retrospective liability can arise in certain circumstances under paragraph 19, Schedule 12, Finance Act 1968.

As explained, the acquisition of a new holding does not normally give rise to any chargeable gain but it is necessary, where more than one class of share etc. is received on the reorganization or exchange, to apportion the original cost between the two or more classes which comprise the new holding. Different rules apply in these circumstances for quoted and unquoted securities and there are further complications where the original holding was held at April 6th, 1965. The four situations thus arising are now considered in detail.

1. Quoted securities acquired after April 6th, 1965

In this case, the original cost is apportioned by reference to the market values of the classes comprising the new holding on the first day on which their price is quoted on a recognized stock exchange (Finance Act 1966, Schedule 10, paragraph 7). Having thus apportioned the original cost to each of the classes of the new holding, the gain or loss on disposal of any of the shares in the new holding can be computed pro rata to the deemed cost of that element.

2. Quoted securities acquired before April 6th, 1965

Where there has been a tax-free reorganization prior to April 6th, 1965, then for the purpose of determining whether the limitations of gain or loss by reference to original cost (Finance Act 1965, Schedule 6, paragraph 22 (4)) apply, it will be necessary to apportion the original cost by reference to market values at the time of the reorganization. The market values at April 6th, 1965, of the different elements of the new holding will be ascertained from the Stock Exchange List.

Where there is a tax-free reorganization after April 6th, 1965, then to calculate whether the section 22 (4) limitation is applicable, it is necessary to apportion both the original cost and the April 6th, 1965, value by reference to market values at the time of reorganization.

The section 22 (4) limitation does not apply where an election is made under the Eleventh Schedule to the Finance Act 1968. In such a case the April 6th, 1965 value is treated as the original cost, and the rules in 1 above apply.

3. Unquoted securities acquired after April 6th, 1965

Where the acquisition takes place after April 6th, 1965, the apportionment of the cost in the event of a reorganization is computed by reference to market value of the new holdings at the date of disposal (Finance Act 1965, Schedule 7, paragraph 4 (5)).

4. Unquoted securities acquired before April 6th, 1965

Where there has been a tax-free reorganization prior to April 6th, 1965, the chargeable gain on a disposal after that date has to be computed by reference to market value at April 6th, 1965 (Finance Act 1965, Schedule 6, paragraph 27 (1)). In other words, the time apportionment formula does not apply. Where a tax-free reorganization takes place after April 6th, 1965, then by virtue of paragraph 27 (2) the gain is computed in two parts as follows:

(i) a valuation has to be made at the date of the reorganization, and the gain from the time of acquisition up to the date of reorganization is computed by the time apportionment method (with the option for the taxpayer to elect for market value at April 6th, 1965);

(ii) the balance of the gain is computed by reference to the difference between the valuation at the time of the reorganization, and the amount received on disposal.

Paragraph 27 of Schedule 6 does not apply where the new holding consists solely of shares of the same class as the original holding, e.g., a bonus issue.

Short-term capital gains

The position under Case VII of Schedule D is broadly the same as that arising under the capital gains tax, although the special problems connected with holdings in existence at April 6th, 1965, do not, of course, arise. The rules for determining a tax-free reorganization are the same (Finance Act 1962, Schedule 9, paragraphs 10–13), and the apportionment of the cost of a 'new holding' is done by reference to market values at the date of disposal in the case of unquoted securities (Finance Act 1962, Schedule 9, paragraph 10 (5)) and by reference to quoted prices on the first day of dealing in the case of quoted securities (Finance Act 1966, Schedule 10, paragraph 15). Capital distributions are dealt with under what is in fact the $\frac{A}{A+B}$ formula (Finance Act 1962, Schedule 9, paragraph 10 (4)), although the formula as such is not set out in the statute.

1968 – An Extra-ordinary Year in the Capital Market

by R. G. BURNS, A.A.C.C.A.

ONE wonders how 1968 will be remembered in the City. Mergers, tenders, financial crises and financial conduct all have a claim to label the year; but perhaps it will eventually be recalled as the year when equities once more reasserted themselves in the capital market.

At the time of writing, even though December's issues are not yet obtainable, it does seem certain that in 1968, for the first year since 1962, more new money was raised by equity issues than by issues of long-term loans. In the intervening years from 1963 to 1967, loan issues dominated the market and recently the facility of paying loan interest from profits before having these subjected to corporation tax has, of course, been a major incentive to increase loan capital.

Even though reliance on loans for the major part of external long-term finance has applied to the industrial and commercial sector for slightly longer (since 1961), this sector also experienced a change in the established pattern of capital raising in 1968. It is the reasons for this last-mentioned change which are discussed here. The discussion falls into two parts, the first of which contrasts the costs of servicing new loans with new equities during 1968, whereas the second part examines whether companies were already too committed to long-term loan finance by the early part of that year to permit the existing pattern of capital issues to continue. (All references to loans in this article mean long-term loans.)

Influence of cost

The question we are faced with, then, is why are the words 'rights-issues' appearing once more in the new-issue columns? Why the switch to equity raising? Could it be that just as cost advantages used to favour additional loans, some re-arrangement of relationships between yields has given equities an advantage? On the face of it this would be unexpected because the net cost of servicing a loan at 8½ per cent – a realistic rate in 1968 – would be only 4·9 per cent after allowing for corporation tax saving at 42½ per cent,[1] and less than 4·9 per cent seems a rather low earnings yield to offer owners of new equity. However, if anything more were offered to them, the cost of servicing the new equity would exceed that of alternative loan finance.

The evidence appears to point to the unexpected having occurred because, as Fig. 1 illustrates, at the time when equity issues were gaining favour in 1968 the net of tax yield on 20-year debentures and loans began to exceed the earnings yield on industrial equities. Or, put another way, if equity capital could have been raised on terms similar to the earnings yields

The author is a lecturer on finance at Brighton College of Technology and is engaged in research at the Centre for Insurance Studies in the University of Sussex. He is also joint author of a book on Business Finance and the Capital Market to be published in the spring.

[1] The costs of servicing equities and loans can be compared either before corporation tax by grossing-up equity earnings yields by a factor 1·74, i.e. $\frac{100}{100-\text{corporation tax rate of } 42\frac{1}{2} \text{ per cent}}$ or after corporation tax by reducing the rate of loan interest to allow for corporation tax savings by multiplying by factor ·575 (1—corporation tax rate of 42½ per cent).

then current, we have experienced a situation since the second quarter of 1968 where equities have appeared to cost less to service than loans.

It can also be seen in Fig. 1 how a decline in earnings yield has often been accompanied by an increase in the proportion of new issues in the form of ordinary shares, whilst an increase in earnings yield has been associated with the opposite effect. The second and fourth quarters of 1966 and the whole of 1968 were particularly good illustrations of these points. It must be conceded, however, that the relationship was absent in the fourth quarter of 1967; but then the disruptive effect of the devaluation of sterling was felt in the capital market as elsewhere.

* Two months only.

It was stated earlier 'that equities have appeared to cost less to service than loans' because equities are only purchased at today's high prices in the anticipation of future returns being very much in excess of the recent returns on which earnings yields are calculated. Although directors are currently raising equity capital at high multiples of recent earnings (i.e., cheaply by investors accepting low earnings yields), they know that higher future returns are required. Investors expect their new capital to be invested only in projects which will yield much higher returns than the low ones which existed on shares when the capital was raised. Hence the apparent cheapness of equities is illusory if one accepts the need to offer shareholders higher returns pretty quickly.

Some might suggest that equity raising directors have shown a good deal of financial acumen in snapping up capital at the very low current rates. Directors themselves, though, are likely to temper this approach with caution and try to achieve the higher future returns required, because the need for equity capital may be repeated and the prospects of receiving it will to some extent depend on the company's earnings being historically attractive.

An examination of the documents sent to shareholders explaining the terms of, and reasons for, recent rights-issues tends to confirm that equities have been issued because of cost advantages. Occasionally, however, the explanations offered are so unflattering that it may have been better to omit them. The following extract is an illustration:

> 'Your board has now decided to take advantage of the present favourable market conditions to raise further permanent capital without delay. While it might have been possible to raise the required amount by an issue of loan capital, this would have meant committing the company to the burden of current high interest rates for many years to come. In your board's view it is preferable to issue share capital and thus to conserve, and indeed expand, the company's borrowing capability for the future.'

If this statement is analysed it means that 'the present favourable market conditions' applied to share capital and not loan capital because the latter attracted 'the burden of current high interest rates'. Furthermore, one would have thought the market conditions which favoured an issue of share capital were the low returns which could be offered on shares relative to the share's price. If this is correct, it seems tactless so to explain it to the very people from whom one is raising the capital.

Influence of existing capital structure

The rights-issue documents recently sent to shareholders also indicate that in some cases share capital has been raised to correct an imbalance in the capital structure which might have occurred had further loans been issued. The following extract is an example.

> 'It is therefore appropriate that the new financing should consist of equity capital in addition to long-term borrowing, to keep the company's capital structure in proper balance.'

Such statements do pose the questions 'what is a balanced capital structure?' and secondly, 'is there any evidence that British industry as a whole is approaching the stage when it is nearly saturated with long-term debt finance and will therefore in future make more equity issues than in the recent past?'

There is no pat answer to the first question. A balanced capital structure for, say, a company owning a group of stores which are eminently suitable for a legal charge to secure a loan, is quite different from that of a manufacturer with highly-specialized fixed assets. There is, however, a general guideline to capital structures, which is that long-term debt should not exceed about 25 per cent of long-term capital. The Good fortune is not a matter of luck; it is largely a matter of careful planning.

Capital growth is sought by most investors and financial security is important to every family man. In the past, these two aims have often been incompatible.

Sun Life have now devised a new scheme which provides the best of both worlds: Capital Growth Endowment Assurance.

This is a special with-profits life policy which uses the F. T. Ordinary Share Index to link the benefits to the value of ordinary shares. The outcome of the policy depends on the progress of the index throughout the duration of the policy and particularly on the level of the index when policy moneys become payable. You thus have a direct stake in equity growth. Further, the policy will be allotted bonuses from Sun Life profits; once declared, these bonuses will not vary in amount.

Substantial minimum benefits are guaranteed and your dependants are protected even should there be a drastic fall in the value of ordinary shares. Premiums qualify for income tax relief.

Their BARCLAYCARDS

Introducing our new Company Card scheme

Your Company does not have to bank with Barclays to be eligible. There is no enrolment fee, or annual service charge with BARCLAYCARD. BARCLAYCARDS will be issued free to your Executives and Representatives, either in the name of your Company, with the holder as the authorised signatory, or in the holder's own name. In either case on presentation of his card the BARCLAYCARD holder will be able to sign for services or goods at over 40,000 hotels, garages, restaurants, airlines and shops throughout Britain. (More places are joining at the rate of over 500 a month.)

Travel

BARCLAYCARDS are particularly useful for settling expenses whilst travelling and all cardholders enrolled in our Company Card scheme will be issued with a copy of our special Travel Directory which lists airlines, restaurants, hotels, garages, service stations, tyre depots and car hire companies throughout the British Isles.

Should your cardholders travel abroad, arrangements have already been made for BARCLAYCARD to be accepted for a wide range of services in U.S.A., Canada, Japan, Malta, Gibraltar and the Irish Republic (subject to current Exchange Control Regulations).

Getting cash without notice

On presentation of his card at any branch of Barclays,*the cardholder can draw up to £25 in cash on his BARCLAYCARD account.He simply signs a Cash Advance Voucher, and keeps a copy. This is the only facility for which a charge is made, (2½% on the amount withdrawn).

Monthly Statements

We send out monthly statements, together with copies of the Sales Vouchers, and full settlement is required within 25 days of the statement date.

The advantages of the scheme are:—

1. The card is a great asset for business entertaining, and travelling, as it eliminates any need to carry large sums of cash.
2. The monthly statements, and copy sales vouchers, provide a clear, regular record of expenditure—how much, on what, and where. This can save your executives time in preparing their expense accounts and your Company time in checking them, making your book-keeping simpler, too.
3. Your Company can settle all its Representatives' accounts with a single monthly cheque.
4. It costs nothing to join the scheme, and the service itself costs nothing either, except when the card is used to draw cash, or the account is not settled in full within the specified 25 day period.

BARCLAYCARD is accepted in more places, and is held by more people, in Britain, than all the other credit cards combined.

point was summarized by P. J. Grant of Lazard Brothers & Co Ltd in a paper presented to a conference on 'Company mergers and acquisitions' at the University of Strathclyde. He said there:

> 'To have 40 per cent of total permanent capital employed (i.e. shareholders' funds plus long-term capital) in the form of long-term debt is an absolute maximum in today's conditions . . . and 25–30 per cent is the upper limit normally found.'

The second question – whether British industry has absorbed as much debt finance as it can for the time being – is a legitimate one when one remembers the high level of debt raising which has taken place in recent years, a fact summarized in Table I below.

Capital issues: new money raised on the UK market by quoted UK industrial and commercial companies.

Source: Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin.

The proportion of UK company finance in the form of loan capital may have increased in recent years as a result of new money received by companies following a capital issue but, in so far as both the shareholders' and loan holders' stakes can be increased by other means, Table I is an incomplete guide to changes in the structure of long-term company finance. The final shape of the changing picture becomes clearer after considering both additions to the shareholders' funds arising from annual profits not distributed (see Table II) and changes in both the shareholders' and loanholders' investments in a company following the settlement by that company of take-over and merger terms.

It can be seen from Table II that the substantial sums added to the equity interest by the simple means of retaining profits earned and thus by-passing the capital market considerably modify the increase in gearing one associates with large issues of long-term loans. It can also be seen that companies have other huge internal sources of finance in the form of annual provisions for depreciation.

Some of the most recent research on capital issues settling take-over deals has been carried out by Professor H. B. Rose and G. D. Newbould[2] when in 1967 they considered a sample of take-overs amounting to approximately £400 million. Their researches indicated that whereas in the period 1954–1958 less than 2 per cent of take-over consideration was in the form of loan stock, in their sample the proportion had risen to 28 per cent. When one allows for a tenfold increase in expenditure on take-overs in 1967 as compared with the average for the earlier period, one has to acknowledge that this is another important area contributing to increased use of long-term loans.

Finally, a less significant factor tending to increase the level of loan finance has been the action taken by many directors to lower their capital servicing costs by converting expensive preference shares into cheaper loans.

Overall view

An overall view of how all the factors discussed have changed the capital structure of companies can be gleaned from an examination of the combined accounts of some of the larger UK companies which are prepared by the Board of Trade and published in the Annual Abstract of Statistics and Financial Statistics. These statistics indicate that between 1958 and 1967 the proportion of long-term loans to total long-term capital rose from 12 to 20 per cent and the cover for interest on those loans fell from 26 to 13 per cent.[3]

It can now be seen, after examining the factors exerting change on the proportion of long-term company finance provided by loans, that there is evidence of a general increase in that proportion. But before one could answer the question asked earlier (i.e., is there any evidence that British industry as a whole is nearly saturated with long-term debt finance?) it would be necessary to examine a sample of companies for each industrial group separately. Then, forearmed with the maximum proportion suitable for each industry, one could decide whether any industries are near their maximum loan usage.

The test of capital structure suggested in the previous paragraph requires a knowledge of the maximum level of loan finance suitable for each industrial group, and because this is something on which opinions are bound to diverge, a different technique has been used. The test applied in this text to decide whether an industry as a whole has much scope to increase its level of long-term debt finance has been to select a sample of companies operating in the industry and to compare the use of long-term loans by each company in the industry sample with the use of such loans by the most heavily loan-financed company in that sample. If the comparison revealed that a high proportion of companies used more than, say, 90 per cent of the level of long-term debt used by the most heavily loan-financed company in the group sample, then the conclusion might be that future capital issues by companies in that industry were likely to be mainly in the form of ordinary shares.

A summary of the statistics produced as a result of this research is given in Table III. In that table the industrial groups are very similar to those used by the Bank of England in its statistics on capital issues by companies in the manufacturing industries. One group – food, drink and tobacco – has been examined in depth and the remaining groups sampled. The food, etc., group was chosen for the depth test because more capital was raised by that group than any other in 1967.

Of course, the validity of any conclusions derived from examining statistics relating to groups of companies, depends to a significant extent upon the accurate grouping of those companies and in this article the classification of companies suggested in Moodies Investment Handbook has been followed. Even though some bedfellows remained which were not completely compatible in their secondary activities and area of specialization within an industry, only companies with similar main activities were compared.

Clearly in terms of the test applied, none of the industries examined were, as a whole, exceptionally highly debt-financed, although the hotel and catering industry (where approximately half of the sample used loans at least 80 per cent as extensively as the most heavily loan financed company in that sector) had obviously made wide use of a considerable proportion of loan capital.

It seems reasonable to conclude from Table III that the existing structure of business capitalization did not of itself, during 1968, impose substantial limitation on increases in the level of debt finance. In fact, with approximately one-third of the companies in the sample utilizing less than 10 per cent of the proportion of long-term loan finance used by the most highly geared[4] company in their group, one could say that scope exists for a considerable volume of loan issues in the future.

Allowance could be made for the highest geared organization being an exceptional case by comparing each company's use of long-term loans with that of the second most highly geared organization in the group. The chemical section as a whole would certainly appear to be more substantially financed by debt if compared in this way. However, it is suggested that the alternative technique is only suitable where the sample is at least ten in number.

Some interesting points emerge on the capital structures of 'smaller' companies as a result of this research. In particular, over one-half of the 'smaller' companies examined used less than 10 per cent of the level of long-term loans used by the most highly geared company in their section. But before concluding that 'smaller' companies are less capable of sustaining a high level of loan capital, it should also be noted that in six of the thirteen industries examined, 'smaller' companies had the highest level of loan capital. Nevertheless, the three sections with approximately one-half or more of the sample using less than 10 per cent of the level of debt used by the highest loan-financed company in the section (chemicals, electrical engineering and mechanical engineering – plant and machinery sector) all had a high proportion of smaller companies in the sample.

Other considerations

One important influence on the type of capital issued has still to be discussed, namely, the restrictions contained in trust deeds accompanying existing loans. Usually such deeds impose limitations on the extent to which future loans can be raised and, from an albeit limited examination of such restrictions, it does appear that without some modification to the relevant clauses, many organizations could not achieve the high use of loans which characterizes some of the companies reported on in Table III. Hence the scope for issuing more loans, limited as it is by reason of these deeds, is not so considerable as might have been assumed following an examination of Table III.

Conclusions

(a) The increase in equity issues by commercial and industrial companies during 1968 was closely associated with falling earnings yields on industrial equities.

(b) It seems unlikely that the extent to which companies already utilized loan finance contributed in a large way towards the reduction in loan issues in 1968.

(c) The use of long-term loan finance varies considerably between companies in the same industrial group and this situation is taken as evidence of their being ample scope for future issues of loans.

(d) When a long-term loan is issued, the trust deed accompanying the loan usually includes restrictions on future loan issues. Such restrictions often limit the company's gearing potential to an amount lower than the maximum open to similar, but less restricted, companies.

(e) It can be seen that the restriction mentioned in (d) may well impose a limit upon the scope for further issues of loans mentioned in (c).

[4] The term 'geared' in this article is used only as a means of avoiding the repetitive use of 'long-term loan financed' and does not include preference shares or bank overdrafts.

Fire Insurance Premiums

by OUR INSURANCE CORRESPONDENT

DESPITE all the publicity to prevent fires and the genuine efforts which have been made by industry in this direction, the estimated figure for material damage caused by fire reached an all-time record last year. The consequential losses are too complex to estimate accurately, but they could well equal the figures for material damage.

At the moment, fire losses appear to be almost out of control and there is no doubt at all that a significant proportion (probably very much greater than is generally suggested) is due to intentional incendiarism. This is a growing social problem and one to which no effective solution has yet been found.

As an example of how widespread this may be, and the under-reporting which probably now exists, one can look at two case histories in which incendiarism was revealed by Court proceedings. In each case, the defendant asked for other offences to be taken into account. These involved a series of fires, the total number of incidents being 38, only seven of which had initially been attributed to intentional ignition.

Even on the official figures (which, as mentioned, appear to seriously under-report the position), it seems that nearly 30 per cent of all fires in buildings – excluding private dwellings – are maliciously caused or are started by children.

Certainly intentional incendiarism is causing considerable concern among fire underwriters – especially since it is quite likely that on a number of occasions it is responsible for some of the really large fires.

Higher premiums

Faced with the rising claims settlements, insurers have no option but to increase their premiums still further. The tariff offices, which control about 75 per cent of the fire insurance in Britain and agree to charge the same minimum rates of premium, are increasing their rates for a wide variety of classes of property, other than those which have approved automatic sprinkler installations. The increases come into effect for policies renewed on and after March 1st.

Although only the tariff offices have yet worked out exactly how much extra to charge, the independent offices and underwriters at Lloyd's can be expected to follow suit. Apart from the fact that almost the entire market is needed to cover the large fire schedules of today, most of these insurers have been making losses on their UK fire accounts.

For many trades and classes of occupation of premises, insurers will be asking for from 25 per cent to 300 per cent (and higher in a few cases) more in premium – quite irrespective of individual claims records.

Industries affected

As an example of what will happen, sugar refineries suddenly will have their premiums increased by six times, and the plastics industry's surcharge also will be increased to 500 per cent of its 1963 level, there having already been a number of increases since then. Sack and bag manufacturers, too, are among those being hit. But some rates are not changing, among them are those for aircraft factories and bleach and dye works, whose current premium rates are no more than 15 per cent and 25 per cent respectively above their 1963 levels.

Naturally, companies with good claims records may feel particularly upset about these flat surcharges being imposed, especially since they are in complete contradiction to the method of rating motor insurance which has been developed, whereby substantial premium concessions are allowed to individual policy holders with good claims records. Insurers, however, make the justifiable comment that, unlike motor business, the losses which they are making in their fire departments do not relate to millions of claims which can be classified and which permit of a high degree of selection to be exercised so far as individual motorists are concerned. The problem lies in the fact that most of the fire wastage occurs as a result of a comparatively small number of really large fires.

Nevertheless, it seems quite clear that the present system of rating industrial premises for insurance premiums is far from ideal and is in need of a major overhaul. The principle which has been adopted so far has been for insurers to concentrate their classification principally on trades or occupancies, features in the construction of the premises, and the fire prevention systems which are installed.

It would appear that this works too much on a rule-of-thumb basis – particularly so far as the flat surcharges which are imposed on basic premiums are concerned – without taking into account such features as 'good housekeeping'. It seems clear, therefore, that many 'good' risks (although the insurers may not recognize them as 'good') are subsidizing the poorer risks. Whilst the whole aim of insurance is to spread the load, no underwriter should accept a risk at what he considers to be too low a rate for that group of business. Indications at the moment are that for certain classes of business, premium rates should be very much higher, whereas for others they could be considerably lower.

New rating system required

A new system of rating must therefore be introduced. The Fire Offices' Committee (the body to which all the tariff offices belong) has appreciated this point and various investigations are taking place to try to devise a method of rating which is more equitable and takes into account the modern factors which are so important. New techniques, processes and methods both of construction and production bring with them new hazards, and it is most important that these should be reflected as accurately as possible in the rates of premium which are to be charged.

Clearly, the companies have set themselves a mammoth task. But it is one which needs to be completed quickly and it may be that they have not devoted sufficient energy to it. After all, the flat surcharge of 15 per cent which was introduced towards the end of 1963 was designed to be nothing more than a temporary expedient. The surcharges for many trades (dependent on insurers' experience in the particular trades) have soared above that figure, but so far no new rating system has been developed.

On one point insurers have been consistent. They have made great efforts to persuade industry to install sprinkler systems. To some extent they have been successful, judged by the recent comments of the home fire manager of a leading insurance company who reported that, during the past three years, the number of sprinkler installations supervised by his company had increased by 40 per cent. Nevertheless, it is still true that in Chicago alone there are more sprinkler installations than there are in the whole of Britain and France.

Broadly speaking, where an approved sprinkler system is installed, rates of premium are very substantially below those applying in similar premises where there is no sprinkler system, though the differentials depend on trade and occupancy. As no more than a guide, in virtually all cases where an approved system is installed, none of the surcharges over and above the 1963 level of premium rate are applied. That is one substantial saving. Even then, a worthwhile discount is likely to be allowed off the basic rate. How much this discount will be depends solely on the individual circumstances. The average discount is in the region of 50 per cent of the premium, the range being from about 20 per cent up to 70 per cent or so.

Add these savings to the grants and tax allowances which can be claimed, and it will be seen that it is no idle claim on the part of the insurers that a sprinkler system will pay for itself over a period of years, quite apart from the greater physical protection which it will give to any business.

Any company eligible for investment grants under the Industrial Development Act 1966 can make a claim to the Board of Trade for new fire protection equipment which is installed. In the development areas the level of grant is 40 per cent of the cost of the equipment and elsewhere it is 20 per cent.

Fire defence equipment also qualifies for tax allowances. Either it is possible to obtain an allowance of $6\frac{1}{4}$ per cent of the cost, less any investment grant, each year until the net cost is written off, or relief can be claimed at 15 per cent per annum on a 'reducing balance' basis.

Two points should, however, be borne in mind. In the first place some fire defence systems can increase the rateable value of property. Secondly, since fire and consequential loss insurance premiums are allowed as a deduction in computing a company's profits, its liability to corporation tax can be increased by $42\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of any premium reduction if the money saved is not used for other expenditure allowable in computing profits.

Since there are so many variations in cost it is difficult to give examples. The insurance industry, however, is currently quoting the case of a company in a development area paying £3,282 in premiums for fire and consequential loss cover. By spending £15,000 on a sprinkler installation, these premiums were reduced by £1,992 to £1,290 per annum. The investment grant was £6,000 and tax allowances are quoted as £239. Thus the 'saving' in the first year was £8,231 and thereafter £2,231 per annum. On this basis the system would pay for itself in four years and after that there would still be the benefit of tax allowances and of substantially reduced insurance premiums. Incidentally, even if the factory taken for the example had not been in a development area, the sprinkler system would have paid for itself in five-and-a-quarter years.

Consequential loss

Whether the reaction of insurers to sprinklers in the future will be quite so favourable as it has been in the past is open to some doubt. There could be certain changes. Already these are being seen in the premiums for consequential loss insurance. Despite what in many cases are substantial surcharges on 1963 rates of premium for material damage, until this year there have been virtually no increases in premiums for consequential loss insurances. This year, however, some increases are being introduced for certain consequential loss indemnities. And it may not be long before some increases in premium take effect even where there are sprinkler installations.

Already there are some underwriters who are saying that although a risk may be theoretically good where a sprinkler system is installed, many of the rates being charged at present are too low and do not necessarily always take into account the fact that, for one reason or another, the system may not operate properly, or at all, when there is a fire. It is felt by some that greater allowance for this should be made in the rating.

Only a matter of weeks ago, the Fire Offices' Committee introduced an entirely fresh set of rules for the installation of automatic sprinkler systems in Britain. The new rules have been described as the most radical revision to be carried out this century, and a major departure from those last issued in 1960.

The aim has been to make a scientific approach to the whole question of the automatic extinction of fires today so as to try to meet the wide variety of conditions which exist, particularly in connection with the heights to which goods are stored and the growing use of new hazardous materials such as foam plastics – which are to be found in what often seem to be the most unlikely trades.

Those drafting the rules have paid attention to the need to keep the capital cost of installations as low as possible, without sacrificing efficiency, and it is felt that in many cases there should be a saving in costs.

There are three classes of risk – extra light hazard, ordinary hazard, and extra high hazard. The last class is divided into process risks and high piled storage risks, the latter having four different categories. In general, the new rules do not affect the amount of the discounts from insurance premiums, apart from the fact that, under certain conditions, single water supplies are now recognized for maximum discount. Incidentally, sprinkler systems already installed will not be affected by the revision of the rules; and extensions to such systems will be allowed under the old rules where it is impracticable for them to conform with the new regulations.

Possible changes

Other changes may be in sight. Many experienced insurance men feel that the tariff system in fire insurance may soon end, as it has in the field of motor insurance. Already the whole supply of fire insurance in the United Kingdom is under investigation by the Monopolies Commission. Nevertheless, whatever changes may come about, it is quite clear that some stabilizing factor will be needed in the market in view of the fact that fire insurance is essentially a long-term business. Certainly insurers are likely to require a central organization to collate and interpret industry-wide statistics and to keep abreast of changes in industry as they affect fire insurance.

Achieving equitable premium rates will not be easy. But it should be possible to improve on the present system.

Taxation Case

A full report of the case summarized in this column will be published, with Notes on the Judgment, in the 'Annotated Tax Cases'

Minister of Labour v. Expamet Contracts Ltd

In the High Court of Justice (Queen's Bench Division)

(Before the Lord Chief Justice (Lord PARKER OF WADDINGTON), Mr Justice ASHWORTH and Mr Justice WILLIS)

Selective employment tax – Refund – Premium – Removable partitions – Steel framework – Company fixes framework – Items of framework obtained from another company – Orders obtained by respondent company – Whether manufacture of curtain walling – Whether within other manufacturing industries – Whether erecting steel structures – Selective Employment Payments Act 1966, section 1 (2) – Minimum list headings 399, 499, 500.

The respondent company held a patent for removable partitions for industrial buildings and offices. The framework of the partitions is of roll-formed galvanized steel, and the interstices are filled in by boarding or panels to make a solid partition wall. The framework is fixed to the building by a screw in the floor and one in the ceiling. Sometimes the partition did not reach the ceiling and was more in the nature of a screen. The partitions could be dismounted and re-erected elsewhere.

The respondent obtained from another company the items which formed the framework of the partitions. Having obtained an order for a partition, the respondent company sent out skilled fitters, who took the necessary components with them, and assembled the partition in the customer's building.

It was contended for the company that its activities fell under minimum list heading 399.2, 'Metal windows and door frames', or 499.2, 'Other manufacturing industries'. For the Minister it was contended that the activities were under the heading 500, 'Construction: erecting steel structures'. The Industrial Tribunal decided that the company's activities were under heading 499.2.

Held: although the company's activities seemed to be under heading 399.2, in that curtain walling was an apt description of them, there was no ground for interfering with the Tribunal's decision.

Finance and Commerce

Montague Burton

THE only black and white pages in the 1967–68 report and accounts of Montague Burton Ltd are the seven used for the accounts. On the other thirteen the print is black but the page colour is pale green with a contrasting silhouette of tailoring motif. A very 'swinging image', all on heavy matt paper and the whole included within a blue board cover. All, in fact, very effective which presumably was the object of the exercise.

An interesting point is that although whole pages contain only one item of information, the colour form and style of the presentation takes the mind away from what some people may consider a prodigal waste of good printing space. For example, the inside front cover merely carries the 'Notice of Meeting' while the opposite page has only the 'Contents' and neither takes a quarter of a page measuring $11\frac{1}{2} \times 8$ in.

As a first-class example of design and layout, the Burton report takes some beating, in this column's opinion at any rate. This column's wife, in fact, was moved without any prompting to comment 'I say, that's very gay – clever, too'; and this column's wife has never been known to comment on a company's report and accounts before in her life.

Room for improvement

Montague Burton in 1967–68 had a good year – a record one in fact. One of those years which prove so good that the chairman can afford to profess some dissatisfaction with the results. 'Of course I am never satisfied, however good the figures are' is the cliché of all chairmanship clichés.

But there is something more than cliché in Mr Lionel Jacobson's contention that the present rate of return is not satisfactory in relation either to turnover or capital employed. 'It must be further improved', he writes in his review and goes on to say that 'the group will take a number of important steps towards this objective in 1969'.

It goes without saying that, in a report as well presented and detailed as this, profits are shown in a 'Seven-year Review' both as a percentage of sales and of assets employed – the figures being 10·7 and 10·5, respectively, as well as being better than anything else achieved in the seven years reviewed.

In the director's report the précis of the breakdown of sales and profits is shown like this:

	Sales	Trading profit (loss)
	£000	£000
Men's tailoring	56,373	7,487
Fashion retailing	6,452	311
Mail order	2,780	(538)
	£65,605	£7,260

Clearly there is one point at which there is room for earnings improvement.

'Restructuring'

'Burton-by-Post', Mr Jacobson admits, has 'temporarily failed to maintain its growth in turnover'. But he holds the view that direct mail order (which is the Burton-by-Post line) is a growth business 'because so many economic and social factors are working to support this method of retailing, particularly the congestion of shopping areas and the spread of payment facilities to a whole new section of the population by means of Giro'.

Last March there was what Mr Jacobson describes as a 'restructuring of the management of Burton-by-Post' as well as a general change in marketing and methods; and the moves seem to be working. To the uninitiated, 'Fashion retailing' may seem to be something new to Montague Burton, but it is not. Peter Robinson is a Burton subsidiary and there are, in fact, 40 fashion stores in the group although that number is in sharp contrast with the 604 men's tailoring stores.

This inevitably means a major property operation and, anent the chairman's comment on profits as a percentage on capital employed, it should be noted that the market value of freehold and leasehold properties is estimated at some £71 million, which is £19 million more than the book value. Group policy is to acquire and hold properties for its own occupation, subletting those parts surplus to retail requirements. Gross rentals from sublet portions in the past year were £190,000, but Mr Jacobson makes the point that 'this feature of property investment will always appear to affect adversely the overall rate of return on capital employed of a chain like ours.'

Expansion

Burton's French subsidiary is now operating profitably. The fifth Paris shop on the Rue de Rivoli has proved a great success and completion, last November, of a lease in a major new shopping centre near Versailles is evidence of further expansion. Montague Burton took their style of multiple tailoring to France convinced of success, and have achieved it.

The main influence on group turnover and earnings in 1967–68 was undoubtedly that High Street spending spree, which government statisticians have tried to show did not take place but which the Government is currently trying to correct with the unprecedented stranglehold on credit. At the half-year mark, the Burton view was that sales and earnings might not maintain the first half's pace. In the event, sales soared and higher production at the factories and higher turnover in the stores made the effect of improvements in productivity and efficiency all the more marked.

Cash flow resulting from increased profits and tighter stock control has reduced Burton's bank overdrafts by £5·1 million. Mr Jacobson on that point comments that, quite apart from the saving of interest payable, 'the group is now free to generate substantial funds internally for expansion and further diversification during the next year or two.'

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE ACCOUNTS

I PROPERTY, FIXTURES, PLANT, ETC.

With the exception of leaseholds which, on 1st September, 1961, had an unexpired life of less than seventy-five years and which are stated at cost, freehold and leasehold properties are stated at a professional valuation on 1st September, 1961, with subsequent additions at cost. All other fixed assets are stated at cost.

The provision for depreciation shown is in respect of properties, plant, fixtures, etc., other than freehold shop properties, and leasehold shop properties having a life greater than 75 years.

Shop properties held on leases expiring within 75 years from 31st August, 1967, in respect of which no capital allowances are obtainable, are included in the balance sheet at a net book amount of £1,840,068 (1967 £1,863,295) after deducting amortisation for the year 1968 of £58,784 (1967 £59,620).

The net amount to which shop fronts have been written down for balance sheet purposes is £596,849 (1967 £673,986). Capital allowances for taxation purposes are not available in respect of this balance and future depreciation charges aggregating this amount will, therefore, have to be made without relief from taxation. The amount of such depreciation for the year 1968 is £139,023 (1967 £144,661) compared with the expenditure during the year on renewals of shop fronts, capitalised in the accounts but allowable for taxation purposes of £63,578 (1967 £95,528).

II INVESTMENT GRANTS

This amount represents estimated investment grants receivable not yet released to revenue. Releases to revenue by way of relief of the depreciation charged in the accounts, are being made over the appropriate lives of the assets, the amount for this year being £33,454 (1967 £36,954).

CITY NOTES

JUST as summer holiday advertising begins before the last Christmas card is delivered, so Budget advice – and rumour – begin to go the rounds of Westminster and the City with the New Year wishes. Car licences apart, the Budget has until now been forecast in terms of neutrality but that has not shielded the Chancellor of the Exchequer from the seasonal plethora of advice, as our columns in past, present – and no doubt future – issues, bear testimony.

But the real point at issue concerning the Budget is that it will come at a time when few, if any, of the current economic doubts are resolved. A Budget presented sometime from mid-March onwards will have been prepared against the uncertain background of ill-defined import trends following last November's import deposit move. It will also have been prepared against the background of an internal credit squeeze, the real result of which can only be guessed at. Because the import position is uncertain and the result of the squeeze questionable, there is every chance that simply by being neutral the Budget could prove wrong.

Last March, Mr Roy Jenkins introduced a Budget which many economists considered hit the economic nail on the head. Events proved Mr Jenkins to have missed the nail and hit his thumb. In being so concerned to hit the nail this year, it is equally probable that Mr Jenkins will hit the economy.

The severity of the final pinch of the squeeze on bank credit indicates that the official view is still very much centred on restriction as the economic way out. If that view is reflected in the Budget and the Chancellor still insists, in the classic phrase, on 'taking money out of the economy' then City opinion is that the result may be an economy knocked in the direction opposite from that which the Chancellor intends.

WHETHER this view is behind the present softness of the stock-market is a debatable point. But equities have none the less been subject to a fair degree of profit-taking these past two weeks and the gilt-edged market has suffered as the result of tax-loss selling to offset the taken equity gains. There is little indication that money, as yet, is moving from equities to gilts but there is indication that equity holders have lately considered that the rise of the market in the first month of the New Year was a rise to be taken advantage of in selling, rather than buying, terms.

The supporting influence in equities continues to be the substantial funds still being attracted by the unit trusts who are as busy as bees in making honey from the pollen of last year's equity performance.

If unit trusts sell on performance, then it is only natural that managers who can point to dramatic performance in 1968 should be selling units on that basis. Newcomers to the ranks of unit trust investors may well be wondering just how many 'best' unit trust performers there actually were last year. The claims are many. Not for the unit trusts any niceties of whether one trust grew despite profits taken and gains tax paid at the expense of the unit price, or whether another grew with no gains taken, with the units thereby reflecting the top of the market and profit-taking – and gains tax – still to come.

BOARD of Trade pressure on Courtaulds to withdraw their bid for English Calico looked inevitable from the time ICI and Courtaulds threw rude words at each other. But it has lowered still further the heat of the big scale merger market and, although there is still plenty of activity lower down the scale, heat taken out of the big end of the merger market may prove to be heat taken out of the equity market as well. After its frantic opening, 1969 may yet be a non-merger event by the time 1970 is in sight.

So, with 4,200 payrolls to process, we put our trust in a super efficient IBM 360/30. In the three years since the service started, it hasn't let us or our clients down once.

The cost of super efficiency is remarkably low. The complete payroll service can be had for 1s 0d. At least that's what we charge you, but when Lowndes-Ajax take over your payroll problems you actually save money. For example, 600 hourly-paid employees need only three-fifths of a wages clerk per week. Also, we do not pay overtime to our computer; it occupies our office space, not yours, and we supply the stationery as part of the service.

What do you get for your money? At the end of every weekly, four-weekly or monthly period we supply payslips, payroll, acquittance roll, control totals, coin analysis, and pre-list of latest cumulative and standard record; each quarter NHI stagger group accounts and payroll register. We also take the end-of-year panic quite calmly and produce forms P9, P11, P60 and P35 (1A) Summary within three days of 5th April. There are various optional extras, like credit transfers, if you need them.

Where any changes are incurred through government legislation, we automatically modify the program and records without any extra cost.

Decimalisation will not cause you any problems either.

After an initial setting up charge of 1s 6d for each new entrant to the payroll the cost is 1s 0d per payslip. Minimum charge £5, with generous discounts for payrolls of 1,000 employees or more.

SCHOOL FEES
a simple solution to a perennial problem

Clients may often ask you whether it is still possible to make really advantageous provision for school fees.

The answer is yes. Under our special Trustee Scheme, capital sum payments in advance continue to attract substantial benefits.

* The capital earns an attractive rate of interest, which is free of income tax, surtax and capital gains tax.
* The termly payments are not aggregated with the parent's income for tax purposes.
* The capital sum can be freed from estate duty liability instantly.

As an example of what can be achieved, a capital sum of £1890 will produce fees of £600 a year for 5 years, starting in 10 years time.

Full details of this important scheme on request.

Integration of the Profession

SIR, – The Association of Chartered Accountant Students' Societies is polling its members on the subject of 'future plans'. Each member is asked in effect to say 'yes' or 'no' to the one question, 'Do you approve future plans'?

'Future plans' is a large and complex document covering many matters. Any thoughtful member, or potential member, of the profession must undoubtedly find some proposals satisfactory and others unsatisfactory in varying degree. The Association's referendum accepts the whole scheme as a package deal. This does not seem to me to be a very useful approach.

Many parts can be distinguished fairly clearly from the issue of amalgamation, and from each other. For example, the proposals on education and training and those on licentiate accountants depend neither on amalgamation being accepted, nor on each other. Either set of proposals could be acted upon separately. Similarly, at a more detailed level, few individuals will agree or disagree with the whole of, for example, the educational proposals; my own views on them were recently expressed in an article in Accountancy.

These proposals are only one set out of a great many possible alternative sets. The Councils of the various bodies will render the profession a disservice if they invite members' opinions in any manner even remotely resembling the simple-minded 'accept or reject' formula adopted by the Association of Chartered Accountant Students' Societies.

Yours faithfully,

Manchester. A. M. BOURN, B.SC.(ECON.), A.C.A.

SIR, – I have read with interest the letter from Mr W. W. Williams published in your January 25th issue.

I attended the meeting of the South Eastern District Society held in Brighton on November 27th last and formed the opinion that the majority of members present, whilst in favour of many of the points in the scheme, were dead against the new category of licentiate accountant.

We were fortunate in having the President and the Vice-President at the meeting and at the end of the discussion I asked the President if the Council would reconsider the mode of presentation of the whole membership on which we will be asked to vote at the extraordinary general meeting. I stated that it would be a great pity if members voted against the proposals because they were so bitterly against certain of the features. I suggested that the Council should consider seriously that the voting paper should cover additional matters, such as those outlined in the letter from Mr Williams.

In reply the President stated that members would only be given the opportunity to vote for or against the scheme. My point was that if the scheme was turned down, the Council would at least be aware of the features which were not acceptable and take some constructive steps to deal with them.

Yours faithfully,

J. T. PATTERSON, F.C.A.

Warlingham, Surrey.

The Common Market

SIR, – It is not difficult to realize that much disillusionment has entered the minds of many supporters of Britian's entry into the Common Market because, as a body, it has failed to live up to expectation, due partly no doubt to being divided within itself.

If anything, France's own domestic problems are in part to blame, whilst Britain's contribution is largely personal in the context of the measures taken to offset the balance of payments problem in which the word 'crisis' is too often quoted, giving rise to the reactionary comments in French circles that 'the British need to put their own house in order'.

It is time we declared ourselves no longer interested in becoming a State within a State.

Yours truly,

Birmingham. FRANCIS B. WILLMOTT.

Pricing Paradoxes

SIR, – Mr E. J. Broster's article 'Pricing Paradoxes' (The Accountant, February 1st) postulates a demand curve which slopes upwards at low quantity of sales and then downwards at higher quantity of sales.

We would all agree that by and large a business which lowers its selling price will increase its quantity of sales and that one which raises its selling price will reduce its quantity of sales.

There may well be isolated examples of increased quantity of sales following an increased selling price, but Mr Broster glibly assumes that a positive correlation between selling price and quantity of sales is a normal situation when quantity of sales is low. This assumption is quite unacceptable, and is, in fact, inconsistent with elasticity of demand being a measure of the degree of competition.

According to Mr Broster's upward/downward sloping demand curve, elasticity of demand must also be upward/downward, i.e., monopolistic at a low quantity of sales, competitive at a middling quantity of sales, and monopolistic again at a high quantity of sales.

In fact, it is not the quantity of sales but the slope of the demand curve which determines the monopolistic or competitive position of the business. A downward sloping concave curve indicates a monopolistic position, whereas a convex curve indicates a competitive position. This concavity or convexity applies throughout the whole length of the demand curve.

Yours faithfully,

London W1. P. L. GRIFFITHS.

Reviews

Share Registration Practice

by the London and Birmingham Registrars' Groups of the Corporation of Secretaries.

Editype Ltd, 171–173 Dyke Road, Hove, Sussex. 15*s*.

The London and Birmingham Registrars are to be congratulated on producing this book on share registration practice which undoubtedly fills a gap in existing professional literature. Share registration work has not hitherto been recognized, or indeed organized, as a separate profession and until comparatively recently registrars were at a disadvantage when negotiations took place which affected share registration procedure. The London and Birmingham Registrars' Groups of the Corporation of Secretaries are among the few bodies that can speak with any authority on the subject of share registration in the UK.

The book, which is fairly brief, is designed to be of use to both the student and the practitioner. The authors have not set out to produce a comprehensive work on all aspects of registration practice. They have, however, succeeded in setting out in a clear and readable form the duties of a registrar with the appropriate references to the relative Acts. In addition, more than half the book (which runs to 78 pages in all) is taken up with appendices showing the statutory forms required and the type of share certificates, dividend warrants, etc., which are in general use today.

There is, perhaps, some danger that this manual may fall between two stools by being too detailed for the examination student and not detailed enough for the professional registrar. An illustration of this point is the chapter on 'Office Machinery, Ancillary Equipment and Computers'. This chapter will be of little use to the student and is much too brief to be anything more than an introduction to the subject of mechanization for the professional registrar.

The main chapters dealing, inter alia, with the structure of a company, the register of members, transfers, transmissions and certifications, dividends and new issues, are excellent. Most texts bearing on the subject have been outdated by the Stock Transfer Act 1963, and it is undoubtedly a great help to many people to have available this up-to-date manual on share registration practice in concise form at reasonable cost.

Pergamon Press. 30*s*.

In recent years programmed learning has developed as a means of teaching in almost all fields of study. This first-year course of programmed learning in book-keeping and accounts is based on the author's experience of teaching the subject in technical college by both the conventional and programmed methods.

The approach, as with all programmed learning texts, is to take the student step by step, commencing with basic principles, with 'feed-back', enabling the student to master the step before going on to the next one.

The course covers elementary book-keeping, including simple partnership accounts and limited companies, as well as incomplete records and control accounts. Where the course is used in class it gives the lecturer an opportunity of concentrating on the difficulties of individual students while not disrupting the overall progress of the class.

The text is well written, though will probably be found to be more suitable for class use than by the individual student with no tutor.

The Church of England Year-book – 1969

Church Information Office, London. 42*s*.

Essential information about the life and work of the Church of England is contained in the 1969 edition of this comprehensive reference book – now in its 86th year – together with 35 separate tables of stabilities.

Substantial increases in parochial giving are shown in the table concerned with the sources of income of parochial Church Councils. Ordinary income in 1966 – the latest year covered – was £26,982,057; this compares with £24,929,739 in 1964. The overall income, including special appeals, legacies, etc., amounted to £33,606,953 (£31,576,567 in 1964). Much of this rise is attributed to increases in voluntary contributions, subscriptions under covenant and income tax repayable.

The book also contains an 84-page 'who's who' of all members of the Church Assembly and of suffragan bishops, deans, archdeacons and members of the main Church Assembly boards and councils who are not Church Assembly members. A useful alphabetical summary of legal information is contained at the end of the book, compiled under the direction of the legal board of the Church Assembly.

Close Companies: Small Shortfalls

The Council was advised that following recent discussions with the allied accountancy bodies, the Board of Inland Revenue have informed them that, as a matter of administrative practice, where a close company is a trading company, a member of a trading group or a property investment company, no shortfall assessment will be made for an accounting period in which the shortfall in distributions is not more than £100 (proportionately reduced for an accounting period of less than 12 months). For this purpose a company will be regarded as a property investment company if its activities consist wholly or mainly of holding property the income from which ranks as estate or trading income under the close company provisions.

This relaxation extends to existing shortfall assessments which have not become final and conclusive. It does not apply to shortfalls calculated under the special rules dealing with cessations of trade or business and liquidations.

Inspectors of Taxes have been advised.

Exchange Control

It was reported to the Council that the Bank of England has prepared two loose-leaf manuals on exchange control. Arrangements are being made for these and subsequent amendments to be made available on loan to members through the Institute Library and district society libraries.

Institut der Wirtschaftsprüfer in Deutschland e.V.

It was reported that Mr J. P. Grenside, F.C.A., represented the Institute at the Study Day of the Institut der Wirtschaftsprüfer in Deutschland e.V. in Berlin from January 21st to 24th, 1969.

Higher Entry Standards and a Junior Qualification

The Council approved the following statement for publication:

The Council of the Institute has previously announced its objective to require a minimum educational standard including two 'A' levels for becoming an articled clerk, coupled with the introduction of a junior qualification for those who do not achieve this higher standard.

Although the Council's policy remains unchanged, the Council regrets that it is necessary to postpone temporarily the introduction of the two 'A' level requirement originally announced as becoming effective for those relying on passes gained on or after September 30th, 1969. This is because the procedures to obtain authority for the junior qualification cannot be completed in time to allow its introduction, with adequate notice, by that date.

If the scheme for the development of the accountancy profession as a whole is adopted, the higher entry requirements and junior qualification defined and explained in the scheme will probably take effect, with transitional provisions, from September 1970.

Meanwhile, the Council regards it as important for students to complete at least a sixth-form course before entering articles, as is already the case with an increasing majority of entrants. One thousand seven hundred and twenty-four entrants with two or more 'A' levels entered into articles during 1968 (compared with 1,549 in 1967) and there were 625 graduate entrants (compared with 463 in 1967).

National Diplomas and Certificates

The Council approved the following statement for publication:

Ordinary National Diplomas and Certificates and Higher National Diplomas and Certificates will in future be recognized for the purpose of entry into articles and for a reduction in service under articles in the following manner:

(i) Where a candidate has been successful in any Ordinary National Diploma or Certificate examination, a pass or credit pass in an acceptable subject (see paragraph (iii) below) will be equated with a pass at ordinary level in a General Certificate of Education examination; a pass at 60 per cent or higher standard in an acceptable subject will be equated with a pass at advanced level in a GCE examination.

(ii) Where a candidate has been successful in any Higher National Diploma or Certificate examination, a pass at any level in an acceptable subject will be equated with a pass at advanced level in a GCE examination.

(iii) The recognition of passes in the manner indicated above is subject in each case to the restrictions as to acceptable passes imposed in relation to GCE and other examinations.

Full details of the acceptability of passes are given in the leaflet Requirements for Membership available at the Institute on request.

LEEDS STUDENTS' DINNER

The 'future plans' proposal that students should become members of the Institute from the moment they were articled was to be welcomed, said Mr E. C. Shaw, F.C.A., President of The Chartered Accountant Students' Society of Leeds speaking at the Society's recent annual dinner.

Mr Shaw, who was responding to the toast of the Society, went on to say that if the scheme was agreed it would involve changes in the formation of student societies. All students would become student members. Students' societies would become a students section of the district societies with two seats on each district committee being set aside for members of the students' branch.

'I think it is a very great advance for students to become student members of the Institute from the moment they start', Mr Shaw said, 'for it does bind them in a real sense into the Institute body as they are admitted and should have the right of representation on the district society committee'.

Reviewing the Society's activities over the past year, Mr Shaw expressed regret that attendances at day courses had again been disappointing. Much time, he went on, had been spent in arranging the courses on matters of practical interest and he felt sure they had been of considerable value.

There was a great deal to be gained in taking an active part in student society affairs and the people who did not respond were the losers, he said. He urged his listeners to make a greater effort to participate in the Society's affairs.

Proposing the toast Mr J. Pinder, a solicitor, referred to the growing volume and complexity of legislation, and to the problem of those in practice in trying to keep their knowledge up to date.

Mr Pinder added that he sympathized with the students of today. 'If you had qualified 40 to 45 years ago you would have had an easier job than you have today. I wonder if we ought not to stand in sympathy for you for two minutes!'

Mr G. R. Adams, Honorary Secretary of the Society proposed the toast of the guests and Mr H. Riley, F.C.A., A.C.I.S., responded.

The Industrial Training Act 1964 has established a system of industrial training boards which are responsible for all forms of training which occur in British industry.

As the author points out in his opening chapter, the system established by the Act is comprehensive and complex and it raises many problems concerning costs, grants, levies and benefits of training.

He outlines the basic approaches to costing used by accountants and then illustrates by means of forms and explanatory tables how budgets for training can be established.

He then goes on to outline routines for collecting training information and stresses that whilst information on how much training is done by a firm must be collected if grants are to be claimed, this does not mean that the costing system must be changed. Relatively minor adjustments will enable memorandum costs to be produced.

In his final chapters the author considers the uses to which training information may be put in controlling training and in planning the training function for optimum results.

Throughout, the book is lucid in style and amply illustrated with examples, diagrams and charts.

The author is a qualified teacher and cost accountant whose previous books include: Planning for Profits and A Simple Guide to Capital Expenditure Decisions and he has a wide first-hand experience of industry and management training in both the United Kingdom and the United States.

Now-invest through Schroders for a mere £2,500.

Schroder Income Fund

UP TO NOW, you would need to be investing six figures or more to go to J. Henry Schroder Wagg & Co. Ltd., the merchant bankers. Their advice has been reserved for handling over £600 million of investments for big institutions, charities, investment trusts—and a few private clients.

But today, if you have a middling-rich client with £2,500 upwards to invest, you can get him the Schroder treatment. Direct. Through these two unit trusts—Schroder Capital Fund and Schroder Income Fund.

You solve instantly the problem of providing an individual portfolio for the man with not enough capital to justify your time and worry but who deserves more than an ordinary unit trust.

WHY SCHRODERS WON'T TAKE LESS THAN £2,500

By limiting initial investment to £2,500 or more, eliminating the small investor and restricting dealing (buying and selling of units) to only two days per month—Stock Exchange Settlement Days—Schroder Funds charges are far lower than most unit trusts—only ¾% initial charge, ½% annual charge. And the difference between buying and selling prices is only 2½% compared with 5% for most other unit trusts. Compare. And consider the savings.

THE SCHRODER TREATMENT. WHAT ARE THE GAINS?

Schroder Wagg combine immense experience with the most modern financial market techniques, applied to stock market investment both at home and overseas—where they have close and most valuable connexions.

And while markets fluctuate and results cannot be guaranteed, Schroder Wagg have proved above-average performance for existing clients.

Example: Two Schroder Wagg Investment Trusts have ranked among the top ten investment trusts over the past five years.*

Your client will get the same treatment. Maximum profitability, low charges-and you won't have any worries.

WHICH SCHRODER FUND FOR YOU?

Needs vary. So there are two trusts. The Schroder Capital Fund puts the emphasis on growth: the Schroder Income Fund puts the emphasis on dividends. Naturally growth is expected within the Income Fund, and dividends, although lower, with the Capital Fund.

SCHRODER CAPITAL FUND

The primary aim of this fund is capital appreciation.

Only a limited number of companies can be expected to perform adequately. So the portfolio will be restricted to those for which Schroder Wagg can confidently forecast maximum growth.

SCHRODER INCOME FUND

Essentially, investment will be in companies which provide a satisfactory income return with prospects of some capital growth.

Depending on day-to-day market fluctuations and the need to maintain a proper balance between profitability and security, a small proportion of this fund may be invested in carefully selected Preference Shares and Fixed Interest Securities.

The Industrial Training Act 1964 has established a system of industrial training boards which are responsible for all forms of training which occur in British industry.

As the author points out in his opening chapter, the system established by the Act is comprehensive and complex and it raises many problems concerning costs, grants, levies and benefits of training.

He outlines the basic approaches to costing used by accountants and then illustrates by means of forms and explanatory tables how budgets for training can be established.

He then goes on to outline routines for collecting training information and stresses that whilst information on how much training is done by a firm must be collected if grants are to be claimed, this does not mean that the costing system must be changed. Relatively minor adjustments will enable memorandum costs to be produced.

In his final chapters the author considers the uses to which training information may be put in controlling training and in planning the training function for optimum results.

Throughout, the book is lucid in style and amply illustrated with examples, diagrams and charts.

The author is a qualified teacher and cost accountant whose previous books include: Planning for Profits and A Simple Guide to Capital Expenditure Decisions and he has a wide first-hand experience of industry and management training in both the United Kingdom and the United States.

Investment Grants Setback

A DECISION of the Court of Appeal last week on St Valentine's Day shows that the scope of the investment grants system which replaced investment allowances is going to be much narrower than industry had hoped.

In its reserved judgment in British Oxygen Co Ltd v. Board of Trade, heard during the last week in January (The Accountant, February 1st), the Court allowed the Board's appeal and dismissed the company's cross appeal against the order of the High Court made last April (The Accountant, May 4th, 1968). That order had laid down, inter alia, that two-wheel trailers used by the company to carry banks of hydrogen cylinders, together with bulkheads and valves, were 'machinery or plant' within section 13 (1) of the Industrial Development Act 1966 and not 'vehicles'.

This meant that capital expenditure incurred by the company on such trailers was capable of approval for grant under the Act, provided that they were for use for carrying on a 'qualifying industrial process' in the course of the company's business of manufacturing and supplying various gases such as oxygen, nitrogen, acetylene and argon, as well as hydrogen, which gases were agreed to be 'articles' for the purposes of section 1 of the Act as defined in section 13 (1).

Section 1 (2) defines 'qualifying industrial process' as 'a process for or incidental to any of the following purposes, that is to say – (a) the making of any article' together with four other categories of purposes including mineral extraction; generation of energy; ship repairing; and building, demolition and civil engineering.

A major source of dispute in the case was as to the precise enlargement on for, which or incidental to effected. The Act itself, in section 1 (3) sets out three categories of activities which (for the purposes of section 1 as a whole) are to be 'treated as a process incidental to' any of the 'purposes'. In the present case the purpose was the making of gas.

The activities to be treated as incidental to the making of gas as a 'purpose' are:

'(a) the repair or maintenance in the course of a business of an article which is used in the course of that business for carrying on a process for or incidental to' (the purpose);

'(b) the storage in the course of a business of anything which is to be used in the course of that business for carrying on such a process' (i.e. a process for or incidental to making the gas) 'or which is to be or has been subjected to, or has resulted from, any such process carried on in the course of that business; and

'(c) the packing in the course of a business of anything which is to > be or has been subjected to, or has resulted from, any such process' (i.e., for or incidental to gas making) 'carried on in the course of that business.'

These paragraphs open a series of Chinese boxes which could theoretically go on and on. First find your basic qualifying process, then find something incidental to it, then something incidental to that, and so on. However, section 1 (3) winds up somewhat inconsequentially with the words 'but, save as aforesaid, repair, maintenance, storage or packing shall not be treated as a process incidental to any of the purposes . . .'.

The Board of Trade argued that the hydrogen trailers were 'vehicles' and therefore the capital expenditure incurred on providing them was not capable of approval under the Act, whether or not they were for use for carrying on a qualifying industrial process. Alternatively, the Board argued that the hydrogen trailers were not for such a use. Both arguments failed in the High Court but the Court of Appeal held that the trailers were vehicles, and therefore the second question did not arise.

The company spends millions of pounds on small cylinders for containing oxygen or other gases. The Board agreed that the cylinders were plant but denied that they were for use for carrying on a qualifying industrial process. In the High Court, Buckley, J., rejected this argument, principally on the ground that the cylinders were used for the storage of the gas itself, i.e., of the article made by the company within paragraph (c) of section 1 (3). Indeed, he went further and held that the transport and delivery of the oxygen and other gas, for which the cylinders were essential, were matters incidental to the making of the gas within section 1 (2) itself, and without relying on section 1 (3). He also held that the cylinders were within (c) of section 1 (3) ('packing').

The Court of Appeal was unanimous that the cylinders were not provided for a process incidental to the making of the gas, nor for storage within section 1 (3) (b), though Karminski, L.J., took the minority view that they were plant used for packing the gas within section 1 (3) (c). Russell, L.J., and Harman, L.J., held that the word 'packing' contemplated plant used to put the articles into the package.

In a cross appeal by the company in connection with its gas tankers which carry refrigerated gas together with complicated machinery for pumping it into the customer's storage apparatus, the company claimed that the tank and pump portions of each tanker were not vehicles, and that if they were vehicles then they qualified as 'a vehicle constructed or adapted for the conveyance of a machine incorporated in or permanently attached to it and of no other load except articles used for the purposes of the machine', within paragraph (a) in section 13 (1). Buckley, J., held that the whole assembly was a vehicle and that neither it nor any part of it qualified under paragraph (a), a decision which was unanimously upheld in the Court of Appeal.

On all the above matters the company obtained leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

The two final declarations of Buckley, J., were that:

> '(5) The [Board of Trade] are not entitled to decline to make a grant towards bulk capital expenditure on [cylinders] on the sole ground that each cylinder costs less than £25', and
> '(6) In so far as capital expenditure incurred by the [company on providing eligible plant] is approved for the purpose of grant by the [Board of Trade] the [company] will be entitled to receive a grant . . .'.

It had been conceded that the Board of Trade had a discretion whether to give grant or not. Grant can be made only on 'approved capital expenditure' and this section 13 (1) expressly defines as 'expenditure appearing to the Board to be of a capital nature and approved by them for the purposes of the grant'.

Moreover, section 1 (1) says that the Board 'may' make grants. Buckley, J., held that there was only one discretion. He held that it had been admitted that there was a practice of refusing grant on plant where individual items cost less than £25. He went on, in his judgment, to say:

> 'to refuse to consider an application for approval for a grant in respect of a bulk purchase of a large number of articles individually costing less than £25 solely (and I emphasize solely) on the ground of the low individual cost of the items would not be an exercise of the discretion but an abrogation of it.'

The declaration did not say 'refuse to consider' but 'decline to make a grant'. The three judges of the Court of Appeal were unanimous that delcaration (5) was wrong and should be struck out.

As regards declaration (6) the evidence indicated that the company's representatives had had correspondence and interviews with the Board of Trade beginning at a time before the Act received the Royal assent. Although the Act contains no provisions for the machinery of application for grants, it is obvious that no grant will be given unless it is applied for and there are, in fact, complicated forms issued by the Board of Trade which in practice have to be completed in detail and accompanied by auditors' certificates. At the time the proceedings were launched a formal claim on these lines had not been made. The Court of Appeal held that the negative attitude expressed by the Board of Trade in the correspondence did not amount to the rejection of a claim for grant. In any case, a formal claim for grant on the plant had not been made at the date the company launched its proceedings. Accordingly declaration (6) did not arise and was premature. It was struck out on these grounds. Leave to appeal against the decisions on declarations (5) and (6) was refused.

Tax Avoidance Approved

THE corporation tax and distribution provisions of the Finance Act 1965 when stripped of the verbiage of the politicians amount to this, that where business is carried on by a company, whether limited or unlimited, the profits are taxed twice over: first, when they are earned, and again when they are distributed.

It follows that to issue preference shares carrying a preferential fixed dividend is an extremely expensive way of gearing up the company's capital. The preference dividends are not deductible in arriving at the company's profit for corporation tax purposes, and therefore they have to be paid out of a fund which has already been taxed at 42½ per cent. Moreover, when they are paid, the company is bound to deduct income tax at 41¼ per cent and to pay it over to the Revenue.

If the company issues loan capital, the interest on it, subject to restrictions on close companies, is normally allowed as a deduction in arriving at profit for corporation tax purposes and so it can be paid out of gross instead of net taxed income. True, the company then becomes a debtor to the loan holders but few companies are particularly put out by this – particularly if the loan holder holds no charge over the company's assets.

Unless the preference shares have been originally issued as redeemable preference shares, the company cannot pay them off without the sanction of the Court under section 62 of the Companies Act 1948, even though all the shareholders consent. Moreover, it is at present extremely difficult and expensive to borrow money, so that the company may be unable to raise the cash to pay off the preference shares. However, section 206 empowers the Court to approve a scheme of arrangement between the company and the various classes of shareholders, without the requirement that every single shareholder or member of a class should consent.

The Court also has power under section 206 to order the convening of separate meetings of the members of different classes of shares. If a majority in number representing three-fourths of the issued shares of the class, present and voting either in person or by proxy at a meeting so called agree to a proposed compromise or arrangement, and the Court sanctions the compromise or arrangement, then it becomes binding on all the members of the class, as well as on the company. The way is thus open for a company to replace preference by loan capital, with considerable tax saving.

Those members of the class who voted against the scheme can, of course, make representations to the Court that the scheme is unfair and therefore to be refused sanction. Such a case came before Mr Justice Plowman in the High Court last week. The applicant was the Imperial Tobacco Company (of Great Britain and Ireland) Ltd. The scheme of arrangement provided for the reduction of the company's capital by £15 million which would later be made up by the creation of 60 million 5*s* ordinary shares.

The object was to cancel the company's preference share capital and to substitute unsecured loan stock in the case of two classes of preference shares. A third class of preference shares was to be paid off. If the scheme was sanctioned, it would save the company £240,000 a year in tax.

One holder of £5,000 of preference stock which was to be paid off and replaced by loan stock carrying a much higher rate of interest objected to the scheme on the ground that it was unfair. That stockholder was itself a company chargeable with corporation tax. Whereas the preference dividends ranked as franked investment income and therefore were not taxed again in the hands of the stockholder, the loan interest would be taxed in its hands at 42½ per cent. Income tax is, of course, deducted from loan interest but the company receiving it can bring it into account against its corporation tax liability. Therefore, although the interest would be 25 per cent greater than the dividend it replaced, the 42½ per cent corporation tax on a corporate stockholder would reduce the income by 28 per cent.

The judge held that the company was not bound to consider the special position of individual stockholders, but only the question whether the scheme was fair to the class as a whole. It follows that if a company contemplates acquiring preference shares in another company, it will be well advised to see that it is not likely to be outvoted by its fellow holders who do not have corporate status.

The objector took the point that the Court had no jurisdiction to sanction the scheme because the chairman of two of the class meetings had refused to accept a proposed amendment. Moreover, the circular explaining the scheme had not adequately explained the implications it had for corporate stockholders. The judge rejected this argument. He said the rejected amendment would have involved a radical alteration of the scheme. Furthermore, the chairman held proxies which he would have cast against the amendment and it was clear that had he done so the amendment would have been lost. As to the disclosure point, the circular had said 'In the case of corporate holders different considerations may apply'. That, said his lordship, sounded a warning note to them. He sanctioned the scheme.

Current Affairs

Accountants and SET

WHEN the selective employment tax was introduced in 1966, the accountancy bodies comprising the Accountants' Joint Parliamentary Committee – that is, the three Chartered Institutes with The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants – expressed their preliminary views on the impact of SET upon members of the accountancy profession in a letter to the then Chancellor of the Exchequer. They pointed out that the proposed treatment of members of the accountancy profession for SET purposes would, in their view, work against the public interest. They felt strongly that the accountancy profession was one whose value to the community was wrongly ranked for SET purposes.

These views were reaffirmed in a letter to the present Chancellor last May when the intention to increase the rates of SET was first made known. At that time the accountancy bodies, in welcoming the appointment of Professor Reddaway to undertake an inquiry into the effects of SET on productive enterprise and the economy generally, urged that the accountancy profession should be brought within the scope of the inquiry.

In a strongly-worded memorandum submitted to Professor Reddaway – reproduced elsewhere in this issue – the accountancy bodies outline the adverse effects of SET on prices, margins and productivity in professional accountancy practices and on the economy generally.

Decimal Currency and Cash Transactions

A FURTHER explanatory booklet was published by the Decimal Currency Board this week. Entitled Cash Transactions during the Changeover (HMSO, price 1*s*; 1*s* 4*d* by post), it is intended primarily for retailers and others who sell directly to the public for cash. During the eighteen-month changeover period after the introduction of decimal currency in February 1971, £ s d and decimal money will be in use together throughout Britain, but shops and other organizations will be working in one or the other system, not both simultaneously. This, however, does not mean that £ s d coins can only be used in £ s d shops and £ p coins only in decimal shops. An explanation of the detailed working is given in the booklet.

Most of the difficulties and misunderstandings of the changeover period will spring from the fact that below 6*d* the two coinages diverge. The booklet points out that if a shopper cannot pay exactly for a decimal purchase which ends in odd pence, he can tender a note or coins with a higher value than the price asked and receive the change.

At a Press conference on Thursday, Mr Noel Moore, Secretary of the Decimal Currency Board, said it was a common delusion to assume that people will need to do complicated mental arithmetic during the changeover period. In fact, conversions from old to new would be rarely needed, he said, and when they were needed people would have conversion tables or dual price tickets to help them. Illustrations of such tickets are given in the booklet.

While the Decimal Currency Board is satisfied that most of the big retailers – departmental stores, supermarkets and multiple chains – are well advanced with plans for switching to decimal currency, they are evidently not so happy about smaller retail concerns – estimated to number some 400,000 – and other businesses such as restaurants and garages. The Board is therefore mounting a campaign directed at such concerns and has designated 1969 as 'The year of the retailer'. In a recent survey conducted on behalf of the Board, it was discovered that less than half (i.e., 48 per cent) were aware that the changeover to decimal currency would take place in 1971. Only 18 per cent knew it would, in fact, be in February of that year; 27 per cent thought that it was in 1970. In a similar survey conducted among the general public, there was only a 36 per cent awareness as to when the changeover would take place.

Tax Institute's Budget Advice

FEES paid for professional assistance in computing and agreeing tax assessment should 'in equity and logic and because of the massive complications of the laws on taxation', be allowed as deductions under any schedule and not just under Cases 1 and 2 of Schedule D. The Institute of Taxation makes this point in its recent representations on direct taxation to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The Institute also feels that the time has now come when the Inland Revenue's published extra-statutory concessions should, in fact, be made statutory. They recommend that an early inquiry should be made to see how many concessions – published or unpublished – can be embodied in legislation. In any event, the Institute says, particulars of concessions – publication of which are at present subject to considerable delay – should be announced in the Official Gazette within one month of their determination by the Board.

Of particular topicality, in view of the Court of Appeal decision in the British Oxygen case referred to on other pages of this issue, are the Institute's comments on investment grants. The new system of investment grants is stated to compare unfavourably in several respects with the former investment allowances. Because of the Board of Trade's discretionary powers, there is often uncertainty as to the category and amount of grant; and the £25 minimum qualifying amount of expenditure on which grant is allowed often has quite inequitable effect. The Institute recommends reversion to investment allowances; or if investment grants must be retained, the terms of grant should be made statutory and not discretionary.

Among numerous other recommendations, the Institute considers that qualifying premiums on annuities under the Finance Act 1956 should be raised to £1,000 in any year; that the £25,000 non-aggregable policies under section 38, Finance Act 1968, should be increased to £50,000; and that the exemption limit for submitting P.11D forms should be raised from £2,000 to £5,000.

On grounds of equity the Institute urges that as the Inland Revenue charges interest on unpaid tax exceeding £1,000 in any one assessment, the taxpayer should have a corresponding right in respect of delay on repayment by the Revenue. Unless a claim is settled within three months of its being brought, interest should be allowed, from the date of lodgement, on the amount finally due.

Management Expenses Appeal

TWO appeals by the Inland Revenue on the construction of section 425 of the Income Tax Act 1952 were allowed by Mr Justice Cross in the High Court last week in Cropper v. BP Ltd and Jones v. Shell Petroleum Ltd

Under section 425 (1) an investment company could claim 'repayment of so much of the tax paid by it as is equal to the amount of the tax on any sums disbursed as expenses of management'. Shell claimed for 1960–61 when its income amounted to £100·5 million and its management expenses (including subvention payments) were £39·7 million. BP claimed for 1958–59, its corresponding figures being £134 million and £38·6 million, respectively.

For each company, part of its income was taxed at the full rate because it arose in the United Kingdom; but the greater part arose abroad and qualified for double tax relief, so that this part did not bear UK tax at the full rate. The Special Commissioners accepted the companies' argument that the management expenses relief should be calculated at the standard rate on the full expenses, subject to a limit set by the amount of UK tax remaining in charge after allowing credit for foreign tax, and the restriction on the amount of relief on section 350 dividend income.

Allowing the Revenue appeal, Cross, J., said that 'grossing up' overseas income by the addition of the foreign tax and then taking the standard UK rate on the gross sum for the purpose of credit were only steps in the ascertainment of the net UK rate at which tax was finally paid. If UK tax was, in fact, charged at different rates on different parts of the company's income, why should one construe 'the amount of the tax' in section 425 (1) as meaning always the standard rate?

Apart from the application of the principle in Sterling Trust Ltd v. CIR ([1925] 12 TC 868), one would find the proportion which the part of the income on which tax was repayable bore to the company's total income chargeable with tax. That proportion of the total tax paid was to be repaid. His Lordship remitted the two cases to the Special Commissioners to determine the repayment on the basis of his judgment.

Questions in Parliament

LEGISLATION to regulate occupational pension schemes, to define the status, responsibility, and duties of trustees, and the conditions under which such schemes may qualify for tax reliefs is to be called for in a question in Parliament to Mrs Barbara Castle, Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity on Monday next. Suggesting the new legislation, Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Cons., Kensington South), says that it could also regulate the method by which the rights of individuals are to be valued on change of employment, and to appoint a registrar with authority to supervise the administration of occupational pension schemes.

Sir Brandon also has two questions down for the Chancellor of the Exchequer the next day which seek to discover the staff savings to the Treasury and the savings to employers which would result from levying income tax at a flat rate in the £ on all earned incomes without concessions or allowances.

A comprehensive reform of British taxation on the lines of the proposals recently published by the United States Treasury for the reform of the American Federal taxation system is also to be called for on Tuesday next in a Commons question to the Chancellor by Mr Kenneth Baker (Cons., Acton).

On the same day Mr Joel Barnett (Labour M.P. for Heywood and Royton), is to ask the Chancellor to make a statement on the effects of present tax incentives to industry for investment in new plant and machinery.

THIS IS MY LIFE

Divide et Impera

by An Industrious Accountant

I WAS very green when I first went from working in an auditors' office to a chief accountant's job in industry, well over twenty years ago. The job was in a small subsidiary factory in the country, manufacturing components for the main works mostly, but it was big enough to hold a sample of each and every headache, business or personal, that I've ever encountered since. Indeed, it's only in retrospect that I really appreciate the significance of my misadventures.

The general manager, who had full responsibility for running the factory on behalf of the board at head office, was affability itself. He was certainly glad to welcome an expert financial member of his team, he enthused; his own experience had been mainly on the sales side; he'd be jolly well charmed to hand over the accounting chores. Presumably I'd like to settle in and pick things up as I went along? He'd arranged everything necessary to get me started.

I wasn't sure exactly what he'd arranged, except that it included a pretty hefty workload. The staff, all local and relatively inexperienced characters, were willing but unskilled. The bank books and petty cash-book were neither up to date nor reconciled; the debtors' and creditors' control accounts didn't agree with anything; and the wages analysis had been completed on a coding basis which the production supervisor wished to modify retrospectively.

Coping with current problems left me with curiously little time or opportunity to look at the wider fields of the work, let alone to provide management accounting services. The GM personally took the morning post for sorting and circulation; it helped him, he said, to keep in touch with operations in general. Unfortunately, it helped to keep me out of touch.

His signature was required for authorization of all invoices and he examined the petty cash-book regularly. A ghastly chore, he explained, but it optimized top-level control. When I became general manager in the fullness of time, he encouraged me, I shouldn't fail to do the same.

He held regular meetings with the production supervisor, the sales supervisor, and the transport controller, but he wouldn't let me sit in at them. All operational bull, too technical for you desk-wallahs, old boy, he insisted jovially. Sometimes I felt on the outside looking in.

So I commenced to stroll down the plant on various errands and to ask the production supervisor about labour costs per section, output standards, and repairs budgets. He was cautious but co-operative. Later, however, the GM discouraged me. The PS, he explained, was rather irked; felt himself under surveillance, didn't see why anybody but his immediate boss should interfere in his domain.

So I obtained the GM's blessing before opening up negotiations with the sales supervisor, who proved shrewd and friendly. Turnover analysis per product per mark-up against forecast was just what he wanted, he said, and we established excellent liaison.

Later, however, the GM commenced to chaff him with heavy-handed humour. 'The accountants have got you toeing the line at last, eh? Wait till they tell the board you haven't achieved your quota! I say, you'll be for the high jump when the accounts report is published!' So the salesman became dour first and snappy later, and our liaison collapsed.

His production colleague, however, consoled him by pointing out that accountants never lasted the pace. I'd had great talk about a plan to chart plant down-time against labour costs during the first month, he said, but I'd never come back to implement the scheme.

Napoleon, I recalled vaguely, safeguarded his personal position by sowing dissension among his marshals, so that Ney and Soult and Massena became enemies in politics and council chambers. Unfortunately, they failed to co-operate on the battlefield, too, with disastrous results. Likewise with us.

RECENT TAX CASE REPORT

Ruling on 'Market Value'

A TAX appeal by Freeman, Hardy & Willis Ltd relating to the valuation of stock unsold at the end of a year's trading was dismissed by Mr Justice Cross in the High Court on Wednesday of last week.

The judge said that about one-third of the company's stock remained unsold at a year's end and for the last 30 years the company, in making up its accounts, had valued that stock in hand at its replacement value, i.e., the price which the company would pay in the wholesale market for stock of that type.

The effect of that was to pass the unsold stock into the next year's accounts at a price which would enable the company to achieve its normal rate of gross profit and to throw the anticipated loss on the year in which the stock had been purchased. That method of valuation had always been accepted by the company's auditors.

Until 1959 it had also been accepted by the Inland Revenue but in reviewing the company's accounts for that year the Revenue had claimed that to enter unsold stock at replacement value was not to show the true profit for tax purposes, and that unsold stock must appear in the accounts either at cost or at market value at the end of the year, whichever was the lower.

Company's method wrong in law

The tax commissioners, though reluctant to allow the Revenue to disturb an accounting basis accepted for so long, had come to the conclusion that the company's method was wrong in law and that the Revenue was entitled to refuse to accept it any longer. It was against that decision that the company appealed.

The judge said the regular replacement of stock was a normal outgoing of a retail business and one might have thought that the expense might be left to lie in the year when it was incurred, even though some was unsold at the end of the year. But if an unusually large quantity of stock was bought in one year and a correspondingly smaller quantity the following year, to put no figure on the stock at the end of the year of purchase would unduly depress the profit shown for the first year and unduly swell the profit for the following year.

For many years it had been accepted accounting practice to bring in the unsold stock – at cost, unless the market value was less than cost – as the closing item of the receipt side of the accounts for the first year and the opening item on the expenditure side of the accounts for the following year.

The formula 'cost or market value – whichever is the lower' had become sacrosanct and in the present case there was no question of any higher figure than cost. The question here was simply whether, if the wholesale market value was less than cost, that figure could be taken, although the retail market value was above cost.

Accountants' differing views

The company contended that a retailer could value his unsold stock by reference to the wholesale or replacement value, even though the obtainable retail sale price would be above cost. The company's argument was that 'cost or market value – whichever is the lower' was an accountant's formula which had to be accepted by the Courts and that its meaning must be determined by reference to the practice of accountants.

But, said the judge, there was a considerable difference between looking to the views of accountants to discover the meaning of 'cost' and looking at them to discover the meaning of 'market value'. Different accountants might hold different views on what expenditure could properly find a place in an estimate of 'costs', and neither view might be inherently unreasonable, in which case the Court might consider that the estimate should depend on such considerations as how the costs had been estimated in the past.

But 'market value' prima facie connoted the price which could be obtained for the article in the market which offered the best price, and the company argued that that should be treated as referring to the wholesale market. But the evidence of the company's auditors only showed that a number of accountants they regarded as 'up to date', had come to think that in calculating profits of a year's trading one should regard a diminution of anticipated profit as an expense, and that accordingly it was desirable to value unsold stock at its replacement value, which necessarily involved treating 'market value' as referring to the wholesale market.

Elusive conception

Those accountants, said the judge, might be right in thinking that that approach got nearer to that elusive conception 'a true profit of the year's trading' – which was the object of all the inquiry – though in connection with the company's unsold stock, the words 'anticipated profit' were perhaps hardly justified, since the company's buyers must have been aware of the proportion of stock that would be left unsold.

Even if the accountants' argument were right, although it might be an argument in favour of embodying the view in some statutory direction as to the appropriate method of computing profits, it was not really an argument in favour of construing 'market value' in what the judge regarded as a quite unnatural sense.

Accordingly the company's appeal was dismissed.

Do we need a New Bretton Woods?

The German View

by S. HAYS, O.B.E., B.Com.(Hons), F.I.S.

IT was interesting to see the views of Mr Paul Bareau on the international monetary system in his reproduced address to the London and District Society of Chartered Accountants in The Accountant of February 8th. International financial arrangements and agreements can have an immensely important effect on the economic growth and economic welfare of all large trading nations, and therefore upon the prosperity of individual firms and businesses within these countries.

Towards the end of January two eminent German bankers, Herr Karl Blessing and Dr O. Emminger, gave their views on the international monetary system. It is of interest to see how these views – as reported in the international Press – support or conflict with those put forward by Mr Bareau. These views, however, need to be considered in the light of the current economic situation in Germany, which is so vastly different from that in Britain. These differing situations can hardly fail to have an influence on the respective views put forward.

The year 1968, saw the achievement of a record German balance of payments surplus, a 7 per cent growth in gross national product, a rapid fall in unemployment, very near stability in consumer prices and in export prices, together with a fall in the wages cost per unit of output in manufacturing industry. This latter fact implies that output in manufacturing rose faster than earnings; and the first, that there was a very large increase in German exports – much larger, in fact, than occurred in Britain in spite of the stimulus given by devaluation. Even with this stimulus, British export prices have grown faster since 1963 than have the corresponding German ones.

So long as the Germans more than earn their productivity increases in wages before they receive them, so long will they be able to sustain a rapid rate of economic growth without running into an inflationary situation accompanied by balance of payments difficulties – a position which has eluded Britain for more than two decades. The spectre of devaluation is never far from our horizon in Britain; in Germany, it is the attractive image of upwards revaluation. Why they should be so afraid of it is difficult to understand.

Dr Emminger made the point that although political and social crises (he seems to have had French crises in mind) may create strains – and even worse – in the monetary sector, the present international monetary situation is not nearly as bad as it is often made out to be. He rejected completely the need for a multilateral realignment of exchange rates. Such a realignment would not help very much in the long run unless the monetary, financial and wage policies of the countries concerned were designed to restore better equilibrium.

He instanced the British devaluation and maintained that economic miracles cannot be achieved merely by a change in parity. He also rejected the idea of a new international conference. In his view, such a conference would only throw international trade and foreign exchange markets into new uncertainties. What is now needed is a period of stability during which the measures taken in recent months by the main surplus and deficit countries could show their effect.

The present monetary system is the result of change and evolution over the past twenty years. The past year has seen two important improvements which are conducive to stability – the establishment of a two-tier gold market and the Basle agreement on Britain's sterling liabilities. The former has reduced the disturbing effects of private gold speculation on monetary stability; and the second has helped to guard against large adverse movements in Britain's reserves. In 1969, a further development can be expected, that is, the system of special drawing rights (SDR's) with the IMF. This is a longer term reform which cannot be expected to bring immediate relief to sudden balance-of-payments crises.

Greater flexibility

The majority of reform proposals now being discussed aim at greater flexibility of existing exchange rate mechanisms leading to a greater autonomy in national monetary and economic policies. In Dr Emminger's opinion, this increased national automony would reduce balance-of-payments discipline and favour inflation. It is illusory to think that any new mechanisms would rapidly remove strains and crises in the international monetary systems. A greater effort directed towards the removal of existing imbalances between the more important countries using existing means of economy and monetary policy would be much more likely to meet with success.

In that part of Herr Blessing's address which was devoted to international monetary problems, he maintained that the current balance of payments disequilibria were the result of the varying degrees of inflation experienced in individual countries; and these degrees of inflation arose from the differences in national economic and monetary policies. The Bretton Woods system was not to blame. The system had brought liberalization of world trade and the convertibility of currencies and in so doing had produced an enormous increase in trade and therefore a marked improvement in living standards.

Although these did not appear in the report of Herr Blessing's speech, it is worthy of note that over the last few years, world trade has grown by an average of 6–7 per cent per annum – a somewhat higher rate than was achieved in the fifties. During the thirties, world trade was declining and the average increase from the beginning of the century up to 1930 was of the order of 2½ per cent per annum.

On the subject of the supposed need to reform the international parity structure, Herr Blessing took a slightly less rigid line than Dr Emminger. He agreed that divergencies in purchasing power and competitive conditions cannot, in the long run, be eliminated by domestic corrective measures alone. Parity changes were, however, only justified if there was no alternative solution in a specific situation. The calling of a large-scale monetary conference would not, in his view, help matters. Rather, it would lead to a fresh wave of speculation. Moreover, the failure of a super-conference, and this could not be ruled out, would have far-reaching and disastrous consequences.

Should price and cost trends in important countries continue to diverge, it will be difficult permanently to maintain an international system with fixed exchange rates. The choice lies between fixed exchange rates with the possibility of small adjustments, or flexible exchange rates and no adjustment process. Herr Blessing prefers the former because in his view it best serves international transactions in goods and services.

Well, there speaks the voice of financial rectitude combined with economic growth. Coming from such a source its significance cannot be denied or ignored.

Taxation Cases

Full reports of the cases summarized in these columns will be published, with Notes on the Judgments, in the 'Annotated Tax Cases'

MacVeigh v. Arthur Sanderson & Sons Ltd

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)

(Before Mr Justice Cross)

Income tax – Investment allowance – Wallpaper manufacture – Acquisition of designs – Whether designs are plant – Whether cost of designs is expenditure on blocks, screens and rollers – Finance Act 1954, section 16.

The company manufactured wallpaper and furnishing fabrics and incurred expenditure in producing or acquiring designs. The Revenue conceded that the expenditure was capital expenditure; that the wood blocks and the silk screens with patterns on them were plant; that the patterned rollers were parts of the machines to which they were fitted; and that wood blocks, silk screens and rollers without patterns on them could play no part in the manufacturing process but would, be inchoate machinery or plant. Accordingly, the company was allowed the cost of unpatterned blocks, screens and rollers and also the cost of patterning. The dispute related to the expenditure on the acquisition of designs.

It was contended for the company (i) that the expenditure was on plant, (ii) that it was expenditure on the provision of the blocks, screens and rollers on which the designs were patterned. It was contended for the Revenue that the designs were not plant; and that the expenditure on them did not form part of the expenditure on the blocks, screens and rollers. The General Commissioners decided in favour of the company's second contention, and expressed no opinion on the first contention.

Held: the designs were not plant; but that the expenditure on acquiring them was part of the expenditure on the blocks, screens and rollers on which the designs were patterned, and that it qualified for the allowance.

C.I.R. v. Kleinwort Benson Ltd

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)

(Before Mr Justice Cross)

Income tax – Dealer in securities – Transaction in securities – Purchase of debentures – Interest thereon in arrear – Interest repaid – Omitted from company's Case I computation – Loss thus shown – Set against taxed interest – Tax advantage attained – Abnormal dividends – But company not entitled to recover tax on dividends – Whether fall in value of securities – Whether company entitled to deduction by reason thereof – Finance Act 1960, sections 28, 43 (4) (g).

The company carried on business as a merchant banker and as a dealer in securities. In November 1962 it bought £88,890 5 per cent second mortgage redeemable debenture stock, and £56,551 6 per cent third mortgage redeemable debenture stock in E.C. (Holdings) Ltd (E.C.) for a total sum of £305,101 os 5*d.* No interest had been paid on either stock since 1939, and in that year a receiver of E.C. was appointed by the Court. The assets of E.C. consisted of shares in Earl's Court Ltd.

In September 1962 an offer had been made by Securities Agency Ltd to purchase the Earl's Court shares for £2,500,000, which was more than sufficient to pay the secured creditors of E.C. in full together with arrears of interest. The receiver accepted the offer, and the sale was completed on November 1st, 1962. On November 28th, an order was made for the payment, out of the funds in Court resulting from the sale, of the amounts needed to pay off the secured creditors in full including interest up to December 31st, 1962. The sum paid to the respondent company was £262,047 9*s* 8*d* made up of £145,441 principal, £2,827 11*s* premium and £113,778 18*s* 8*d* (£185,761 10*s* 6*d* less tax £71,982 11*s* 10*d*) interest. Thus the amount, £262,047 9*s* 8*d*, received by the respondent company was about £42,000 less than the sum, £305,101 0*s* 5*d*, which it had paid for the debentures.

In accordance with the ordinary practice the interest was left out of the respondent company's Case I computation, and the computation showed a loss on this transaction of £156,832 9*s* 5*d*, i.e., £305,101 0*s* 5*d* less principal and premium £148,268 11*s*. Although the company had borne tax on the interest, £185,761 10*s* 6*d*, it saved tax on the £156,832 9*s* 5*d*, and the difference, £29,929 1*s* 1*d*, on which it ultimately bore tax, was the actual profit it made on the transaction as a whole.

The company's investment policy was to make a profit represented by sale price over cost. The company did not draw any distinction between principal and interest or dividend. The director in charge of the investment department inquired from a colleague whether there would be any tax problem relative to the interest, and on being told that there would not be one, he dismissed tax from his mind. He knew that the interest would be received after deduction of tax, but he did not concern himself with that. The debentures were redeemed much earlier than he had expected; and after the company had bought them, the market price rose. The company did not incur an overall loss in the relevant accounting period.

The Inland Revenue served a notice on the company under section 28 (3) of the Finance Act 1960 that the profit made in the accounting period ended December 31st, 1963, should be recomputed at £1,463,274 by excluding the £156,832 9*s* 5*d*. The company appealed.

It was contended for the company that any tax advantage had not been obtained in the circumstances set out in paragraphs (a) or (b) of section 28 (2); and that the obtaining of a tax advantage was not one of the main objects of the transaction. It was contended for the Revenue that the obtaining of a tax advantage was the main or one of the main objects of the transaction; that a tax advantage within the section had been obtained; and that the specified adjustment was appropriate. The Special Commissioners decided that the transaction was carried out for bona fide commercial reasons; that the company had not shown that tax advantage was not the main or one of the main reasons; but that the tax advantage was not obtained in the circumstances described in paragraphs (a) and (b); and they discharged the notice. The Revenue appealed, but did not challenge the Special Commissioners' decision that section 28 (2) (a) had no application to the case.

Held: (i) on the assumption that one of the company's main objects was to obtain the right to deduct the £156,832 9*s* 5*d*, section 28 (2) (b) had no application, because the company did not obtain that deduction in its Case I computation by reason of a fall in the value of the debentures as a result of the receipt of the interest; (ii) that the obtaining of a tax advantage within section 43 of the Finance Act 1960 was not the main or one of the main objects of the transaction.

Income tax – Transfer of assets abroad – Transferor then resident abroad – Debt due to him for transferred assets – Transferor receiving payments after becoming resident in United Kingdom – Whether transfer must be by resident individual – Whether tax within the section includes repaid tax – Transfer not for tax avoidance – Whether associated operations can give power to enjoy income from transferred assets – Income Tax Act 1952, sections 412, 413.

The taxpayer was the controlling shareholder in a Northern Ireland company (the N.I. company), and until May 1949, he was resident in the United Kingdom. In that month he went to live in the Republic of Ireland, and became a non-resident of the United Kingdom. Since October 1953, he had been resident and ordinarily resident in both the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland.

In March 1951, the taxpayer caused a company (the R.I. company) to be incorporated in the Republic, and later in the year he sold to that company a property in the Republic, and certain farm stock and machinery, and 30,000 preference and 29,000 ordinary shares in the N.I. company for £86,917. The purchase price was satisfied by the allotment to him of 6,000 £1 shares in the R.I. company, the allotment of 4,000 shares to the trustees of a trust for his son, and the balance of £76,917 was left owing to the taxpayer. On December 31st, 1954, the taxpayer transferred 2,000 shares in the R.I. company to the trustees, and that made the trustees the majority shareholders. The taxpayer was the chairman of the company, and was in control of its policy.

The R.I. company received substantial dividends from the N.I. company, and these were virtually its whole income. The R.I. company was repaid, under the double taxation agreement, the tax deducted from the dividends. The R.I. company paid no dividends during the years under appeal, but paid to the taxpayer sums totalling £15,676 in reduction of the debt due to him.

Assessments to income tax for 1953–54 to 1957–58 were made on the taxpayer pursuant to section 412 of the Income Tax Act 1952. He appealed on the grounds (1) that the transfer of his shares in the N.I. company had been made at a time when he was not resident in the United Kingdom, (2) that the dividends received by the R.I. company from the N.I. company had borne tax within the meaning of section 413, although the tax was subsequently repaid, (3) that the transfer of the shares had not been made to avoid United Kingdom tax. The Special Commissioners decided the third contention in his favour; but that certain associated operations brought the case into section 412.

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal in Northern Ireland): the associated operations did not produce any rights by which the taxpayer had power to enjoy the company's assets or income; and that the section was not applicable.

The Role of Accounting

Difficulties are no Excuse for Inadequacies

by R. J. CHAMBERS

QUESTIONS about the adequacy of business accounting have been raised intermittently for many years and in many places. Several years ago some trenchant remarks first appearing in The Economist and The Accountant were widely quoted. In the last few years numerous actions have been initiated against auditors in the United States. There have been similar occasions for critical remarks in Australia over the last five years. We refer only to more recent events: but there is a long line of critical observations, by practitioners, business and financial people and academics, reaching back decades.

These questions and criticisms have provoked few responses other than statements about the difficulties accountants have to face in preparing financial statements, or acknowledgements of the difficulties which readers untrained in accounting have to face in reading them. But responses of neither kind have removed or will remove the cause of complaint. They are, indeed, quite beside the point. If accountants have difficulties, so do lawyers, and pharmacists, and physicians, and engineers. Yet we do not hear their difficulties held up as excuses for their inadequacies. People expect those who profess specialized skills to be confronted with difficulties and to go about their elimination.

As for the difficulties of users of financial statements, it is not unlikely that they arise from the peculiarities of present forms of accounting rather than from ignorance of financial matters. Most adults have some reasonable apprehension about what their financial positions are and what their incomes are; and certainly the bankruptcy laws presume they understand these things.

A superficial reading of the professional and financial Press may lead to the belief that these complaints are few and occasional. But the memory of unpleasant things is notoriously short. It needs a deliberate act of going back over the record of complaints to convince one that scarcely a year passes without some newsworthy event which casts shadows of doubt over the adequacy of accounting.

But those familiar with the technical features of accounting can find evidence closer at hand. They should be well aware that things which have the same meaning to other people are given quite different meanings in the course of accounting; that things given the same description in accounting are different; that what was a proper enough representation of assets or shareholders' equity years ago is often still reported in the same terms today, though prices and price-levels have changed materially in the interval. There is a host of such oddities. We expect no reasonably informed accountant would say there was not cause for complaint.

The author of this article is Professor of Accounting in the University of Sydney, and a member of the American Accounting Association.

It was suggested in The Economist that the first step towards the improvement of accounting lay in the determination of the role of accounting in business and financial affairs. But there is yet no sign that professional organizations are disposed to take this task seriously in hand. No official statement elucidating the role of accounting has been made. There are many statements on how this or that should be treated in accounts and financial statements. But how a transaction, an event or a balance should be treated depends on the role accounting information is expected to play in commercial dealing and in the reflections prior to dealing.

It is curious that there is no clear statement of the role of accounting as a preface to the recommendations made from time to time by professional organizations. It is also unfortunate. For in the absence of a statement of role, recommendations and rules have come to be accepted which have quite mixed effects; and the divergence of practices from ideals may be expected to continue under the influence of forced or unreal analogies.

Facts for investors

The way in which business and its financing are now organized has cast accounting in the role of fact-finding, continual fact-finding. Investments in firms by shareholders or creditors are not irrevocable. They may be made and unmade at the will of investors and creditors, through the use of transferable securities and the negotiation and re-negotiation of credit. Where negotiations are face to face, financiers may make such stipulations and require such information as they deem necessary for the protection of their interests. There is no less reason for enabling investors in transferable securities, who do not deal face to face with the issuers of shares and debentures, to have factual information for the protection of their interests.

Company legislation attempts to secure the supply of this information in respect of companies in which the investing public is substantially interested. It does not presume that the terms of issue of the securities themselves constitute all that subscribers or holders need to know. The provision requiring the publication of annual financial statements and reports contemplates that under the influences of the markets it operates in, a company's position may change from time to time; and that the extent and effect of these changes should be explained from time to time; and further, that given the nature of those changes and the actual position resulting from them, investors and creditors will be able to choose knowledgeably among the possible uses to which they may put their funds. Two things should be noticed.

The reference to their funds does not mean the company's funds. The funds of investors and creditors are the market selling prices of the securities they hold at any time. What they or their antecedents subscribed to a company on the issue of securities is of no consequence as far as present actions are concerned. An investor may think poorly of himself if at any time market prices are below what he paid for securities, or well of himself if they are above what he paid. But the only money quantities which enable him to think about whether he could be better off than he is are the market resale prices (e.g., the quoted buying prices) of the securities he holds.

As a first approximation to whether he might be better off by making an alternative investment, the investor may use the dividend yield. If the facts disclosed by the company give him grounds for believing that future dividends may be higher, or that the resale prices of his securities will in future be higher, he will adjust his expectation. If he judges that the investment of the amount of the market resale price of the securities in another venture (real estate, bonds, other company securities, bank deposits) would yield a return higher than the adjusted yield (other things being equal), he will sell and invest the proceeds otherwise.

Company law quite properly prevents an investor withdrawing his share of the equity at will. But as compensation he is required to be given information, from time to time, on which he can decide what he should do with his investment or his voting or other rights. Notice that in reflecting on what he should do, an investor needs to have the market resale prices of his shares, the facts disclosed by the company, and his own evaluation of what future yields from holding the investment may be. The law does not require accountants or managers to do the evaluating of future yields. It leaves that to the investor and his advisers.

Notice, secondly, that the whole object of the market in securities and other property rights is to give investors the opportunity of investing in one thing or another; in particular, of investing in the securities of one company or another. To reflect upon investing in another security, an investor will need to know the purchase price of that security and the latest facts about the company which issued it; and he will need to form some expectation of the future yield from it. These are exact parallels of the matters referred to when dealing above with his present security holdings. The resulting expectations can therefore be compared and a choice may be expected to emerge.

But the parallels are exact only if the two companies have adopted the same rules in ascertaining and reporting on the facts. Suppose both companies owned an identical asset; that one was bought ten years ago for £10,000, and the other was bought one year ago for £30,000. If these figures were used in the reports of the companies they would not be using the same rules for stating present facts. Not even if they appended the words 'at cost'; for by 'cost', one company would mean 'cost ten years ago' and the other would mean 'cost last year'.

If the assets were depreciating assets and the two companies used different expected lives, different expected scrap values or different methods of calculating annual depreciation, the companies would not be using the same rules, even though the same word 'depreciation' is used for the charge against revenue and in the name of the resulting provision. And if the same depreciation methods were used for identical assets bought at different prices, the amount of depreciation for the same usage or the same interval would be different. The reader is at liberty to add illustrations relating to the values of stocks on hand and other assets.

Two conclusions emerge. To compare an investment in company securities with an investment in anything other than company securities at any time requires that all the information shall be as close to contemporary as possible; the same principle applies to comparison of two or more investments in company securities. And if the financial results and positions of two or more companies are to be compared at any time for the purpose of forming expectations, the accounting rules they adopt should be substantially uniform in effect.

We are not neglecting the influence on expectations of judgements of investors on the 'style' of a firm, its reputation, its management, the prospects of its industry and other things which are not quantifiable. These will determine the adjustment of expectations previously mentioned. But 'adjustment' entails that there is a base from which to adjust, a base in factual figures of a financial kind, for financial expectations are what are to be compared.

Facts for creditors

The legal rights of creditors to financial information on the states of affairs and results of companies may not be quite the same as the rights of shareholders: for example, some such rights are exercisable through trustees for security-holders, rather than by security-holders directly. But the substance of the law, and the substance of the information necessary for the protection of creditors, run in the same direction as for investors.

When, for example, reference is made to use of the current ratio, it is implied that assets presently saleable for so much money are available to pay off present liabilities of such and such an amount. Contemporary prices of the assets are clearly relevant. Further, when in loan indentures or trust deeds there is stipulated that borrowings shall not exceed a stipulated multiple of shareholders' equity, contemporary prices are also implied. It would be pointless to compare a debt presently stated in pounds of present purchasing power with the amount of net assets (shareholders' equity), if those assets are represented at prices paid at various times in the past expressed in pounds of various purchasing powers. Such comparisons make farcical the protective provisions of the contract – the two monetary magnitudes are just not comparable. The relationship of debt to equity at any time is only significant as a protective device if the amounts of assets are contemporary prices or based on contemporary prices.

It is false to suppose that loan creditors are concerned solely with the interest rate on their loans. Even in nominal terms, the rate of interest is the less if full recovery of the amount of the loan is not possible – and there are many instances of that. Protection lies in knowing that whatever a debtor company paid for assets charged as security, the present resale prices of those assets still provide ample backing for the loan.

Facts for managers

The managers of business concerns need factual and up-to-date information no less. Companies may compete in fractionated markets for labour, commodities, plant and so on. They also compete in the market for undifferentiated money funds. Those which are able to pay the higher price for the use of funds are able to bid money, and hence other resources, away from the less efficient. At least this is the principle upon which markets in money and securities are supposed to be based.

For years there has been considerable concern with the productivity of industries and firms. But there is no way in which the aggregate productivity of a firm may be compared with that of another except by the use of a rate of return on capital. Physical measures of productivity (man-hours per unit of product and the like) are only partial measures. A firm may have a high physical output per man-hour and still be unprofitable through inefficiency in its developmental or marketing or financing operations and inefficiency in the administrative co-ordination of its operations. The periodical rate of return encompasses all facets of a firm. It is the only general indicator which enables judgements to be made about the relative efficiencies of firms.

If managers are closely concerned with the relative efficiencies of their firms, they may be expected to require factual information which will yield reliable rates of return. The rate of return which is significant at any present time is the ratio of recently earned income to the amount currently invested to earn it. It is no use comparing the amount of recent income with an amount invested years ago. The profit rate on paid up capital disregards amounts reinvested or ploughed back over years, and it disregards the difference in meaning of £1 years ago and £1 today. As in the case of the investor we considered, the rate of return is presently significant only if the recent income is related to the present measure of capital employed; and the present measure of capital employed is the difference between the sum of the present market resale prices of the firm's assets and the sum of its liabilities.

Significance of rate of return

How is this current rate of return significant to managers?

First, there is no absolute rate of return by reference to which a firm can be said to have done well or poorly in a given year. The whole of business is affected by general economic conditions from year to year; the level of aggregate profits is not necessarily the same in successive years. In addition, the profits of firms and industries are affected differently by the particular and general economic circumstances in which they find themselves year by year, and by the efforts made by managers to meet them.

It is generally presumed that managers of firms in a particular class of business, subject to its particular economic circumstances, will be able on the average to do as well financially for their companies as managers of other classes of business. Managers therefore may judge whether they have done as well as, or poorer than, or better than other managers, only by comparisons of the rates of return earned by their own companies and by others under similar general circumstances. This entails that the figures from which their measures of income and capital invested are derived shall be contemporary figures, and that the modes of calculating income and capital invested shall be substantially similar for all companies.

Second, if any part of the assets of a firm or of the business of a firm is severable, and if there is any occasion to try to improve the overall rate of return, managers will want to know the present market resale prices of those assets or the assets employed in that part of the business. Their situation is exactly the same as that of the investor already discussed. They may liquidate any combination of assets and invest the proceeds in securities or in other tangible assets. But to think about these possibilities they need to have the present market resale prices of assets (current information about the funds that could be made available), the present purchase prices of alternative assets (current information obtainable in the market), and the expected proceeds of continuing as before and of switching to alternative ways of operating. Again, the need for information about the firm in terms of contemporary prices is clear.

Facts on performance

Whether or not managers are closely concerned with relative efficiency, investors and the financial community generally should be able to judge between companies just the same. It is deemed to be in the public interest that such judgements shall be made; if it were not, we should not have disclosure or financial publicity laws and independent audits.

Expectations of all kinds, and the decisions based on them – in personal, business and governmental affairs – are found to be in error or ineffectual. Not all expectations and decisions, certainly; but more than enough to serve as a caution against believing that anyone, including managers, can choose a course of action which will produce just the results expected. There are too many counter-players, near and distant, for that; too many events in the yet unknown future. It is reasonable, therefore, that investors and the business community generally shall be able to review the factual results and positions of firms from time to time; to obtain explanations of why they are what they are; and to bring to bear their judgements of relative efficiency by revising the basis of their dealing with firms, or by showing their approval or disapproval by bullish or bearish dealings in the securities of firms.

If protection is inadequate against the practice, managers can, of course, evade this kind of scrutiny. If their opinions, hopes or judgements influence the figures which are published, they can filter the facts through such screens of optimism or pessimism, liberality or conservatism, as seem to them to serve their immediate purposes. In this way the representation of the effects of specific advantageous or disadvantageous events may be lagged or accelerated. Profits may be smoothed, or be shown to fluctuate more wildly than external observers might expect.

Of course, this also interferes with investors' assessments. If the profits are smoothed of a company which does a fluctuating business, that is, a business from which the annual income is risky, investors are led to believe that risks are fewer than they are. On the other hand, the rosy expectations and the liberality of dividend promises and scrip issues of companies attempting to fend off take-over bidders strongly suggest that profits have been better than they have appeared to be.

Facts and public policy

The effects mentioned are not generally deliberately contrived by managers in defiance of accounting principles. They are, in fact, consequences of the looseness of accounting principles – the wide range of possible practices which are permitted in accounting. The cost or market rule and other rules for stock-in-trade, the range of depreciation rules, the deferred recognition of changes in prices and the neglect of changes in the purchasing power of money are all parts of the accounting apparatus which can interfere with the representation of results and financial positions in uniformly up-to-date terms from year to year.

In so far as governmental policies are directed towards the support of some firms and the restraint of others, factual financial information of the same contemporary kind is necessary from time to time. A considerable amount of aid to particular industries is given by governments by way of bounties or tax concessions; and restraining influence is exercised by specific taxes and the limitation of tax concessions. If it is to be seen clearly which industries can afford additional imposts and which need additional relief at any time, only financial statements which are based on contemporary facts will serve, and only such statements will fairly represent the drift of things.

If particular firms or industries wish to seek governmental aid or relief in one way or another, contemporary factual information is also necessary. It is necessary as a basis of reflection, and subsequently of argument, on the part of petitioners. The mere familiarity with specific costs or rises in costs, or with the prices of, say, foreign competitors' products, is not of itself sufficient; for they give no real idea of the systematic consequences or effects on the results of specific firms – particularly when, as under present accounting rules, those results are not free of ambiguities.

The same information is necessary on the part of the importuned governmental authority; it cannot judge reasonably or fairly on the basis of financial information of the mixed kind now found in accounting statements. Nor, in view of the potential divergences in accounting method, can it form a reasonable idea of the impact of proposed changes of policy on a group of companies in a given industry; not can it compare groups of companies in different industries to ascertain the probable differential effects of proposed changes in policy.

Further, if particular individuals, firms, trade associations and similar bodies, wish to keep under review the effects on companies of governmental fiscal policies, contemporary factual information is necessary. Such exercises as that of the former Federation of British Industries and of specific companies in the United States and Australia in the early fifties, designed to show that taxes were eroding capital, can be of little effect if it appears that companies do not keep their accounts in such a way that the consequences complained of cannot come readily to notice by reference to the financial statements themselves. Indeed, it was said, at an official level in the United States, that the tax authorities could not be expected to take notice of the effects of inflationary conditions unless companies themselves were to take the initiative in modifying accounting methods to show those effects.

Contemporary facts

Finally, if governmental or industrial policy is to be framed on the basis of fact and informed opinion, rather than on partially informed opinion based on the products of mixed and inconsistent accounting rules, the statistical agencies should be able to rely on the factual and up-to-date character of financial statements of business companies and firms.

Statisticians and economists make use of published company information for various purposes; but it is unlikely, to judge from the brief observations of those who take notice of accounting in the literature of economics, that they are aware of the variety of factors which make that information much less than ideal for analytical purposes.

Thus it seems beyond question that managers, investors, bankers, trade associations, statisticians and statistical agencies, economists, governmental authorities and politicians all need and make use of financial information relating to business firms. To carry out their assigned functions knowledgeably, and therefore responsibly, they need up-to-date factual information. And, of course, each of the above classes of persons plays other roles. Managers are investors and taxpayers and advisers to government, and so on. If any class of persons acquires information by virtue of any particular role, the same information may come to be used by them in other roles. If the information is of mixed quality, partly up-to-date and partly out-of-date, there can be no knowing how extensive are the effects of misinformation.

Hitherto the necessity of up-to-date, factual financial information has been overlooked or set aside. It is commonly said in support of prevailing modes of accounting, that the prime function of annual accounts is to serve as reports on stewardship. This is interpreted to mean that the accounts are to show how the shareholders' money has been spent.

Shareholders may well want to know that all the money coming into the hands of managers has been accounted for. That can be done by an audit of the accounts, no matter what rules are adopted for deriving net profit and financial position. But more important than this is knowledge of what has happened as a consequence of that spending. Have the assets acquired gone up or down in price? Were they a good investment? The answers to such questions are anterior to such further questions as: Are those assets at present prices still a good investment? Are the shares of the company still a good investment in the light of the present prices of its assets?

Disclosure and the law

Company legislation, as we have noted, has demanded that a true and fair view of the state of affairs of a company and of its results shall be given annually to shareholders and that the information shall be available to others. There can be little doubt that the law has contemplated the possibility that shifts in prices of all kinds of goods and services may influence a company's position and income-earning potential from time to time; and that the effects of these shifts would be disclosed. If these effects are not intended to be disclosed, whatever the reason, the aim of the law is a very shallow aim. It would not take account of the various forms of analysis, reflection and calculation we have been considering. On the other hand, if these effects are intended to be disclosed and they are not in fact disclosed, the law is circumvented.

It may seem to be unduly severe to say that the law is circumvented. For if we contemplate the whole life of a firm, what is not disclosed in one year is necessarily carried forward and disclosed in some later year. If real estate is carried at cost, for example, over a long period in which its market price increases, the increase will become apparent and be disclosed when the property is finally sold. But shareholders who live long enough to see this will find it cold comfort; especially if they have long since sold their shares without knowledge of the rising market values of the properties which stood behind their security investments. This, indeed, happens to shareholders in many companies which are the subject of take-over bids.

Lagged disclosure is not in any sense in the interest of present shareholders; yet lagging persists in spite of the widely held view that the publication of financial statements is primarily for the benefit of present shareholders. Lagged disclosure is not the kind of progress information which the law contemplates. It is, indeed, non-disclosure of significant information.

Critical observations of this kind are not new. They have been made, in various forms, in the course of discussions and individual expressions of view by some accountants, by financiers, by stockbrokers, by economists and by businessmen for at least five decades. But they have led to no change in the general doctrine of professional organizations or textbook writers. None of the inquiries into the future of education for professional accounting has paid the slightest attention to the divergence between existing rules and the manifest need of all parties for contemporary financial information – and there have been recent inquiries in the United States, Canada, Australia and New Zealand besides in Britain.

Anticipatory calculations

Instead of improvements in the direction of the discovery of present facts, there are indeed signs that greater value is being set on the manipulation of hypothetical magnitudes, such as the calculation of present values of expected receipts and payments. Without doubt, present value calculations and discounted cash flow calculations are necessary in the course of reflection upon and appraisal of future operations. Their use is entailed in our earlier observations on the formation of expectations. But two points should be noted.

The accountant's contribution to forward calculations is a purely formal, arithmetical one. He does not know markets like marketing men; or technology like technical men. Specialists must be relied on to estimate expected costs and expected sales. Given their guesses, the calculation of present value and the laying out of budgeted inflows and outflows is relatively simple arithmetic.

Secondly, if such calculations are to be worth while, the present position must be adequately accounted for by the record of the past; and it must also express the immediate potential for proceeding with such plans as may be considered. There can be no gap between what expresses the effect of the past and what is available to proceed to the future. Any suggestion that accountants can serve management or investors better, by paying less attention to accounting for the past and more attention to figuring about the future, neglects the relevance of the present facts to judgements about both past and future. If balance sheets do not show, unambiguously, contemporary positions in contemporary terms from time to time, it is impossible to deduce unambiguous indications of periodical results.

In spite of much talk about management information among accountants, no clear line is drawn between what is factual (which is surely what 'information' means) and what is speculative and hypothetical (which is surely not 'information'). There is no generally accepted exposition, in detail, of the manner in which facts of the past and present, hypothetical figuring about the future, and the general aims of firms or their managers, are brought to bear on present problem situations. The brief account here given is dealt with more fully elsewhere.[1] It does not seem likely that present confusions will be eliminated until the relation of accounting to the thinking and bargaining processes of all who engage in commercial dealing is clearly understood and accepted as the foundation of accounting practice.

Importance of scoring

In every competitive sport – from card games to long distance running, from marbles to cricket – factual indicators of progress and the state of the 'game' from time to time are necessary. In many, pacers are introduced to spur contenders to their best performance. These discernible indicators guide the players in the selection of tactics and in the timing of their efforts. Whether the test of success is the number of runs scored as in cricket, or the number of points scored as in a pentathlon, or the number of minutes and seconds taken over a set course as in running, the scoring dimension is known and the incidental features are treated as incidental.

Business has many, if not all, of the same elements. Companies and their managers compete for labour, goods, money, prestige, growth and what not. As the ability to compete and to stay in the game depends on access to money the scoring dimension is money. Factual indicators of progress and the state of the game are as necessary as in sports and for the same reasons. And every firm can be a pace setter for the rest, but only if the accounting methods of all are free of rules and devices which distort results and make comparison a futile exercise.

Certainly it helps if the units of the scoring dimension are the same over time. A run, a point, a minute, a mile, was the same in 1949 and 1959 as it is in 1969. It is not so with the £. But if it is the business of accounting to keep score in units which vary in significance through time and which, to be understandable, must be homogenized at any given time, the task must be faced. It is no service to managers, investors or anyone else to pretend that what happens to the significance of the £ from time to time just does not happen.

Companies Act 1967

The Companies Act of 1967 provided an opportunity for strengthening the long-standing requirement that financial statements shall give a true and fair view of financial positions and results year by year. It seems clear that some consideration must have been given to the necessity of bringing up to date the valuations of assets. The provisions requiring the dates of revaluations and the names and qualifications of valuers are evidence of this. But the provisions apply only where revaluations have been made.

Perhaps investors should be thankful for small mercies. But the old framework which permits the continued use of original purchase prices remains unaltered by this tinkering. If revaluation is justified at all, the continued use of original purchase prices is not. And if the dating of revaluations is significant to readers of financial statements, so also, it seems, would the dating of original purchase prices be significant. At least such a form of reporting would show how out of date many of the figures in balance sheets are – a fact which is quite pertinent to investors but of which they are now denied knowledge. Modest and piecemeal changes of the kind made in the Act can have no general influence on the common mode of determining periodical incomes and financial positions.

The laxities and the illogical and contradictory elements of accounting need removing in the interests both of those who use accounting statements and of the profession itself.

In respect of users, the imperative arises from the link between industrial efficiency and living standards on the one hand, and the link between the efficiencies of particular firms and their survival in the face of competition at home and abroad on the other. Financial reports which represent the states of affairs of companies and their results in continuously up-to-date terms may contribute to the maintenance and improvement of efficiency by making possible self-examination, external scrutiny and comparison to an extent not now possible.

In respect of the profession, the imperative arises from the dissatisfaction which must be felt towards a code of rules which cannot be rationalized as a whole, as well as from the criticisms, complaints and legal actions which present practices have evoked. Neither professional self-discipline nor professional influence can be exerted while there is no ideal conception of the primary task of accounting and no body of specific rules consistent with that ideal. Examination of the information required by all kinds of business people leads to the notion that the primary task is continual fact finding. Improvement in the present situation is unlikely unless the fact-finding role of accounting is explicitly recognized, in principle, in rule and in practice.

Accounting has been allowed to run down under the plea of difficulty. Much has been said about the difficulties of reporting on a factual and contemporary basis. But if the ingenuity which has been devoted to finding difficulties had been devoted to finding solutions, the difficulties may long since have disappeared and industry, investors and the community generally would have been the better off as a result.

The Age-old Problem of Incomes and Prices

by R. ROBERT, A.C.I.S.

HISTORY has notoriously a way of going round in circles and just now, with the PIB an accomplished fact and legislation on the trades unions pending, we seem to be approaching a situation that was taxing the ingenuity of governments – civic and national – as far back as the fourteenth century. Even then there were conflicts between masters and men, between producers and consumers, and it is fascinating to look back and see how similar were the methods employed to resolve those conflicts and maintain economic law and order.

The Guilds

In medieval times the production, distribution and exchange of goods were in many ways more highly organized and more rigidly controlled than they are today. After the Norman Conquest, in the twelfth century, merchant guilds came into being in almost every town in the land – London being the principal exception – armed with Royal Charters that gave them a virtual monopoly of trade. They became powerful and as often as not were in full control of the machinery of local government as well as of all buying and selling of goods. Only men of substance were eligible for admission to the merchant guilds.

During the fourteenth century, because of their exclusiveness and autocratic methods, merchant guilds were supplanted by the craft guilds which were more democratic and included not only the masters but the journeymen and apprentices. Gradually these craft guilds – which were basically associations of skilled workers residing in the same town and pursuing the same occupation – took upon themselves a wide variety of functions. This is particularly noticeable in the case of the London craft guilds, many of which – such as the Mercers, Vintners and Goldsmiths – are still in existence.

At the time of its origin the guild system, which embraced three classes of members – master-craftsmen, journeymen and apprentices – was an almost perfect form of economic organization. Little, if any, distinction existed between the master and his assistants. They worked together, lived together virtually as a family under the same roof, and had well-defined mutual rights and obligations. They had a common interest in maintaining standards of workmanship and in raising the reputation of their craft. They had a general identity of purpose.

Statute of Labourers

In many ways the craft guilds anticipated the modern welfare state. They had schemes for relieving poverty among their members, as, for example, that caused by sickness, unemployment and old age. For the apprentices they provided a thorough technical training – after 1563 the usual period of apprenticeship was seven years – and, even more important perhaps, a moral discipline intended to turn them into law-abiding and responsible citizens. From an economic viewpoint, however, the key activity of the guilds was their regulation of wages and prices.

Quite often, it is true, the wages of workmen were fixed by the municipality or by the central government, as in 1351 when the Statute of Labourers was passed.

A visitation of the Black Death a little earlier had decimated the population and wages, following the laws of supply and demand, had risen sharply. Parliament therefore decreed that all able-bodied men and women, without other means of support were to accept service with anyone who might choose to engage them at the old rates of pay. Suppliers of the necessities of life were at the same time exhorted to keep their charges at reasonable levels. This legislation was a complete failure – indeed, a catastrophe – for it helped to precipitate the Peasants' Revolt thirty years later.

Nevertheless, there is ample evidence to prove that the craft guilds did manage, over fairly long periods, to fix both wages and prices to the general satisfaction. Journeymen's wages, for example, were usually assessed by the warden and overseers according to ability and skill. Any master who paid more than the fixed rate made himself liable to a fine. Nor, it may be added, was it permissible for an employer to pay less.

So far as prices are concerned the record is less clear. Not infrequently, however, the guilds made it their duty to decide what the producer of a commodity might fairly charge the public. The London Shearmen, Weavers and Coopers, for example, had in the fifteenth century established regular scales of charges. These had the threefold effect of giving the master a fair return for his outlay, preventing unfair competition and protecting the interests of the buyer.

Strikes

This comparatively happy state of affairs broke up as abuses began to creep into the system and as disputes arose – between the guilds and the civic authorities and between the masters and their journeymen and apprentices. From below came a constant pressure for higher wages; from above an unceasing counter-pressure to preserve the status quo. Both wages and prices, it was argued by those in control of the economy, must be kept steady. The inevitable outcome was a long series of disputes over wages, working hours and conditions.

The arguments, pro and con, have a strangely familiar ring. Workers advanced their demands for more wages and complained loudly about the rising cost of living. Meeting with obdurate opposition, they attempted to form associations – 'break-away unions' – independent of the guilds. Journeymen held secret meetings and entered into pacts for enforcing an improvement in their lot.

From the masters came accusations of idleness, drunkenness, gaming and restrictive practices. They alleged that their workers were entering into conspiracies to raise wages to excessive levels, to shorten hours, to bring the guilds into ill-repute by bad workmanship, to disrupt production by absenteeism and strikes.

To meet the rising tide of disaffection, Parliament in 1548 took the position in hand and passed an Act which forbade artificers to establish unions with the object of altering their conditions of labour. In the preamble to this Act it was alleged that workers had made confederacies and promises, and sworn mutual oaths not to meddle with one another's work (a hint of demarcation rules!); not to finish what another man had begun, nor to exceed certain production limits per day.

The penalties for infringement of the 1548 Act were severe: for the first offence a fine of £5 or imprisonment; for the second a fine of £20 or the pillory; and for the third a fine of £40 or the pillory or loss of an ear.

Combination Acts

These condign punishments were probably not often applied, for in the majority of cases the old English custom of settling disputes by agreement and compromise prevailed. Masters and men, instead of engaging in 'unfitting contests and debates' and fighting to a finish, composed their differences and having done so joined in the ceremony of placing lights on the altars of their patron saints.

Historically, the Act of 1548 is important because it foreshadowed the Anti-Combination Acts of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. By then, of course, the old feudal economy, with its handicrafts and intimate personal relationships, had been replaced by laisser-faire capitalism and machine production. Class conflicts had sharpened, especially after the French Revolution, and employers feared not only the demand for higher wages and improved conditions, but the complete overturning of the existing social order. As in the past, they invoked the aid of Parliament to forestall revolutionary disturbances; in fact, before the end of the eighteenth century more than forty Acts were passed with the object of preventing any combination of masters or men from raising or lowering wages or increasing or reducing the number of working hours.

Two Acts passed in 1799 and 1800 made trade unions illegal. Many were obliged to disband while others continued to exist in the form of friendly societies or went underground. That uneasy situation continued all through the Napoleonic Wars and right up to 1824, by which time the mercantilist theory of a controlled economy was virtually dead. Adam Smith's views on labour, on competition and free trade were being widely accepted. Changes in the law became inevitable.

It was a radical tailor, Francis Place, who managed to persuade Parliament that the mass of existing legislation was not only a hindrance to trade but, under inflationary conditions, virtually unenforceable. The result was that in 1824 the Combination Acts, which had tried to grapple with some of the same problems now facing Mrs Barbara Castle, were repealed. Fresh restrictions were, indeed, placed on the trade unions in the following year but the workers' fundamental right to organize themselves, and to bargain with employers, was retained.

Death Duties

UK–Ireland Double Taxation

by GEORGE C. MASON

ALL Acts of the Imperial Parliament up to 1922 (except those specifically not applying to Ireland) were made applicable to the Irish Free State by the Adaptation of an Enactments Act 1922 of the Oireachtas (Dail Senate and Governor-General, representing the Crown) of the new State. Orders made pursuant to the powers of the Act were to make provisions for any necessary changes.

Orders under the Adaptation Act made provision for the words 'Saorstat Eireann' where the words 'United Kingdom' appear in British taxation statutes up to 1922. The necessary amendments to 'Ireland' or 'Eire' from Saorstat Eireann being made under section 12 of the Constitution (Consequential Provisions) Act 1937 and by article 11 of the Irish Constitution of that year.

In this way estate duty was imposed by the Finance Act 1894 in the Republic with the necessary amendments, as was succession duty by the Succession Duty Act 1853. The Revenue Commissioners order (No. 2 of 1923) pursuant to the Adaptation of Enactments Act 1922 provides that every reference in a British statute in force in 1922 to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue is to be construed as a reference to the Revenue Commissioners. Legacy duty in Ireland is imposed by the Probate and Legacy Duty (Ireland) Act 1814 and the Stamp Duties (Ireland) Act 1842. Both legacy and succession duty still exist in Eire.

Double taxation agreements

The statutory basis for double taxation relief ('death duty' or otherwise) as between Great Britain and the Republic is in Great Britain the Irish Free State (Consequential Provisions) Act 1922, and in the Republic The Double Taxation Relief Act 1923.

The Irish Act enabled the Executive Council to enter into agreements with the Governments of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to obviate double taxation. The English Act provided for the making of Orders in Council to give relief in cases where there is a charge to both British and Irish tax in respect of the same subject-matter. The Irish order, so far as estate duty is concerned, is the Double Taxation (Relief) Order 1923 (No. 7 of 1923) and the corresponding British order is the Relief in respect of Double Taxation (Irish Free State) Declaration 1923 (S.R. & O. 1923 No. 406). The orders are in identical terms and may be explained as follows:

If the Commissioners of Inland Revenue are satisfied that estate duty is payable in Ireland by reason of a death after April 1st, 1923, they are to allow a sum equal to that duty to be deducted from the estate duty payable in England on the same death;

If the Irish Revenue Commissioners are satisfied that estate duty is so payable in England on the death of a person so dying, they are to allow a deduction from Irish estate duty of the amount of the English duty.

All questions as to the local situation of property are to be decided in accordance with the law enforced in Great Britain and Ireland of December 6th, 1922.

It is clear that the operation of the last paragraph is to fix the situation as at 1922 so that neither country can, by its own legislation, create a different area of administration or location.

Further orders pursuant to the Irish Free State (Consequential Provisions) Act 1922 and the Double Taxation Relief Act 1923 were made by both Governments in 1926 to give relief in respect of double taxation to succession duty. There would be no question of double taxation to legacy duty which follows the law of the domicile.

The orders are identical and provide that when the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or the (Irish) Revenue Commissioners, as the case may be, are satisfied with a form of a settlement in the Irish Free State, or as the case may be, in the United Kingdom, and that succession duty is payable in the relevant form, they shall allow the amount of the succession duty so payable to be deducted from legacy or succession duty payable to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or the Revenue Commissioners as the case may be. The relief is therefore of the same nature as that allowable in respect of estate duty. Examples of estate duty reliefs will first be considered.

Estate duty reliefs

Example I

A dies domiciled in Ireland in 1967 and free estate only passes on this death. The total value of the estate is £72,000 which consists of Irish assets in marketable securities of £40,000 and British marketable securities of £32,000. There were no debts.

(a) Irish duty at 33 per cent on total estate of £72,000	23,760
Less British duty of 21 per cent on £32,000	6,720
Irish duty payable	17,040
British duty payable	6,720

(b) If A had died domiciled in England and the identical assets had passed the position would be as follows:
British duty at 40 per cent on a total estate of £72,000	28,800
Less Irish duty at 18 per cent on an estate of £32,000	5,760
British duty payable	23,040
Irish duty payable	5,760
		£28,800

It may happen that more duty is payable in the country of non-domicile than of domicile – thus, Example II:

Example II

A dies in 1967 domiciled in the Republic and there passes on his death assets of £116,000, of which £110,000 are marketable securities situated in England and £6,000 are marketable securities situated in Ireland.

Irish duty at 40 per cent on £116,000	46,400
English duty at 50 per cent on £110,000	55,000
British duty unrelieved, i.e., excess of 50 per cent over 40 per cent on £110,000 (£55,000 −£44,000)	11,000

Settled property

The reliefs apply also to interest passing on a death under settlements so that relief is allowed under Irish settlement in respect of duties payable in Great Britain on British assets comprised therein and in the converse circumstances. The domicile of the life-tenant is relevant so far as aggregation is concerned.

Example III

C died domiciled in England and the following assets passed on his death:

Free Estate	£
British	21,000
Irish	22,000
Total free property	43,000
Aggregable therewith:
Irish securities the corpus of an English settlement	15,500
Total for rate (aggregable UK at 35 per cent)	£58,500

Aggregable in Ireland £22,000 (free property) plus £15,500 (settled property) total for rate £37,500, rate 21 per cent.

Payable as follows:

Free property	£
British duty 35 per cent on £21,000 (UK assets)	7,350
British duty 35 per cent on £22,000 (Irish assets)	7,700
	15,050
Less Irish duty 21 per cent on £22,000	4,620
Payable Great Britain	10,430
Payable Ireland	4,620

Settled property	£
British duty at 35 per cent on £15,500	5,425
Less Irish duty at 21 per cent on £15,500	3,255
Payable Great Britain	2,170
Payable Ireland	3,255

Legacy duty

As already stated neither legacy nor succession duties has been abolished in Ireland and in the incidences is the same as in Great Britain before 1949.

Legacy duty depends on domicile and is payable on gifts by will or gifts mortis causa, and interest passing under intestacy where these gifts or interest are of pure personalty wherever situated when the deceased died domiciled in the Irish Republic. The duty is payable on the benefit to the beneficiary concerned and the rates vary in accordance with the relationship or otherwise of the beneficiary to the testator, intestate, or donor mortis causa.

The rates are 5 per cent for benefits taken by brothers or sisters on lineal descendants thereof; and 10 per cent in respect of all other persons, including those related only by natural ties. The rate which applied in respect of spouses, children and their issue, and fathers, mothers and lineal ancestors has recently been abolished.

The duty is payable as and when the benefit arises, but if the duty is payable at the same rate and there are successive interests, the duty is payable at once out of the capital. Thus, if A bequeathes his residuary personalty to his nephew, B, for life and after B's death to A's nephew, C, duty is payable on the net residue at 5 per cent when it is retained by A's personal representatives at the end of the administration period (the day of retainer) for the life interest and the ultimate absolute beneficiary. A's personal representatives are the accountable parties.

Again, if one-half of A's estate only goes to B, his nephew, and the other half to C, the stranger in blood, duty is payable by A's representatives as to 5 per cent in respect of A's benefit and 10 per cent in respect of C's. If, however, A gave a life interest in his pure personalty to his nephew, with the remainder to C, a stranger absolutely, B and C will not be entitled at the same rate. B's interest will be charged at 5 per cent on the value of an equivalent annuity computed according to the table to the Succession Duty Act and is payable in four annual instalments, or wholly in advance, discount being allowed on B's death. C's reversionary interest becomes chargeable at 10 per cent on the capital when he gets it. The trustees of the fund are accountable on death.

Succession duty

Succession duty is payable on gratuitous acquisitions (successions) in respect of all interests in pure personalty taken under a settlement as opposed to a will or intestacy. It is also payable in respect of all interests in realty and chattels real situated in the Republic where these arise under a will or settlement.

In respect of realty and chattels real, the test is merely the situation of the property and the domicile of the testator or intestate is not relevant. The proper law of the settlement is not relevant. In the case of pure personalty, the duty would only arise if the proper law of the settlement is Irish.

The rates of succession duty are the same as those indicated in respect of the legacy duty and vary in the same way in accordance with the relationship or otherwise of the successor (beneficiary) to the predecessor (the donor). It does not seem possible to pay succession duty on immovables all at once when the successors are all entitled to successive interests at the same rates, so that when B and C are entitled at the same rate, say 5 per cent, and there is a life interest to B with remainder to C, the duty of B's life interest will be first paid and the duty on C's succession when it arises.

The duty on the life interest is calculated pursuant to the tables to the Succession Duty Act 1953. In the case of interest in pure personalty, the duty is payable as in the case of legacy duty in four instalments. In the case of limited successions to real and leasehold property, the duty is payable by eight half-yearly instalments. Since the abolition of legacy and succession duty in England, there is no relief for duties paid in Ireland given against any English duty.

Example IV

An example of the application of the foregoing principles is as follows:

A dies domiciled in Ireland and the following assets passed on his death:

Free estate Irish realty	.. ..	£18,000
personalty	.. ..	20,000
			38,000
British	.. .. ..		47,000

A's debts amounted to £500 and the cost of administering his estate amounted to £750. There also passed on A's death the following items of settled property:

(1) A life interest in settled Irish realty of which the predecessor was A's uncle and the successor to the absolute interest a son of A (Settlement 1) value £30,000.

(2) A life interest in English personalty settled by the will of A's brother, B, who died domiciled in Ireland, passing absolutely to another brother, C (Settlement 2) value £40,000.

(3) A life interest in Irish personalty settled by the will of A's aunt who died domiciled in England passing to A's brother, C (Settlement 3) value £50,000.

By his Will (1) A gave a bequest of £10,000 2½ per cent Consols to his nephew, X, for life, with remainder to a stranger absolutely. X was aged 33 at A's death. He also (2) gave a further gift of £20,000 2½ per cent Consols to X, with remainder to his niece, Y, and he (3) gave the freehold land 'Blackacre' to his nephew, Z, then aged 40, for life, with remainder to his niece, Y, and is valued £10,000. The land is subject to a lease of £100 per year for 999 years. The residue (4) goes to a stranger. Value of Consols 50.

The position is as follows:

Estate duty
Ireland	£	£	£
Free estate Irish ..	38,000
Less debts	500
		37,500
British		47,000
			84,500
Settled: Settlement 1			30,000
Settlement 2			40,000
Settlement 3			50,000
Total for rate (40 per cent)			£204,500
England
Free estate			47,000
Settlement 2			40,000
Total for rate (45 per cent)			£87,000
Irish Duty on £84,500			£33,800
Less English duty on £47,000 at 40 per cent			18,800
(N.B. – 5 per cent unrelieved.)
Irish duty payable			£15,000
English duty payable at 45 per cent			£21,150

Succession and legacy duties on A's death
Succession duty – Settlement 1

The settlement here is of immovables so succession duty is payable. A and his son, being respectively nephew and grand-nephew of the predecessor, would be entitled at the same rate (5 per cent) but there could not be a once-for-all payment of succession duty (as there could be of legacy duty), to frank the life estate of A and the absolute succession of A's son.

Accordingly, succession duty of £1,500, that is 5 per cent on £30,000, is payable. It is assumed that succession duty was paid previously on the uncle's death on the value of A's life estate pursuant to the tables to the Succession Duty Act and the money necessary to pay the duty was realized out of the settlement. If it was not, the amount thereof would be deductible from the £30,000 before computation of duty.

Legacy duty – Settlement 2

Legacy duty will be payable in respect of the assets of £40,000 comprised in this settlement, because, although the assets are English, the domicile of the testator, B, was Irish. It is assumed, however, that duty was paid on the corpus on B's death to frank both A's life estate and C's absolute reversion, the two beneficiaries being entitled at the same rate. If this was done accordingly no legacy duty would now be payable. There is no legacy duty payable in respect of the sum of £50,000 Irish personalty comprised in the will trusts of A's aunt (Settlement 3). Although the assets are Irish the domicile of the disposer is English.

Succession and legacy duties under A's Will Bequest (1) legacy duty: The value of the capital is £5,000. The income at 2½ per cent is £250 per year. The value of an annuity of £100 on a life aged 33 pursuant to the tables to the Succession Duty Act 1853 is £1,605 4*s*.

Accordingly the value of the life interest is £3,013. Duty is payable at 5 per cent on this figure, i.e., £150 13*s*. On the death of the nephew X the capital of the legacy fund is liable to duty at 10 per cent as passing to a stranger. There cannot be a once-and-for-all payment on the capital to frank both the life interest and the remainder as the nephew and the stranger in blood are liable at different rates.

Bequest (2) legacy duty: The value of the capital is £10,000. Here the nephew and niece are liable at the same rate. Accordingly a single payment at 5 per cent, i.e., £500, discharges the liability in respect of the life estate.

Devise (3) succession duty: The capital value is £10,000 and the income is £100. The value of an annuity of £100 on a life aged 40 under the tables to Succession Duty Act is £1,483 10*s*. Duty is accordingly payable at 5 per cent in respect of the life estates on this sum and, further at 5 per cent on the capital value on the succession of the niece. Although the nephew and niece are entitled at the same rate there cannot be an initial once-and-for-all payment in respect of succession duty on realty.

(4) Residuary bequest: The legacy duty in respect of this bequest will be computed as follows:

Free estate		£	£
Irish			38,000
English			47,000
			85,000
Less: Estate duty	33,800
Debts	500
Administration costs ..	750
Bequest (1)	5,000
Bequest (2)	10,000
Devise (3)	10,000
			60,050
			£24,950
Duty at 10 per cent on the residue as passing to a stranger			£2,495

Estate Duty, Settlements: Settlements A, B and C, will each pay estate duty in Ireland at 40 per cent on the repective capital sums. Settlement 2 will be liable at 45 per cent in England and this will frank the Irish duty on Settlement B.

CANADA

Chartered Accountants' Handbook

THE Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants has replaced its bulletins by a loose-leaf handbook divided into two main sections – a history of the Institute and research recommendations. All the material has been put into logical order under a number coding system that enables the user to go directly to the desired subject. The handbook costs $10, including binder, and the annual subscription for all releases will be $3, but it is free to Institute members.

The new recommendations included in the Handbook deal with accounting for and disclosure of unusual and non-recurring profits and losses. These recommendations will result in greater consistency in the financial statement treatment of extraordinary items, prior period adjustments and capital transactions.

An important item in the updated research recommendations is a shift in the preferred terminology for titles of financial statements – income statement instead of profit and loss, and the statement of retained earnings instead of earned surplus.

The CICA research director, Miss Gertrude Mulcahy, says that the CICA's research committee is now considering several new projects. 'There are many problems in accounting, auditing and financial statement disclosure on which the business community wants guidance from the accounting profession,' she said. 'With the release of the Handbook, we have launched studies into a number of critical areas – prospectuses, calculations of earnings-per-share, definition of the term 'market' when used in inventory valuation, adverse and piecemeal opinions and negative assurances by auditors.' The committee hopes to complete these studies later this year and issue official recommendations for inclusion in the Handbook.

While research recommendations are not binding on CICA members, they have strong persuasive force. Since first issued in 1946, the research recommendation shave continually set much higher standards of financial statement disclosure than have been required in the governing statutes, and recommendations have been followed by a vast majority of companies.

Universities and the Profession

THE first issue of a recently introduced Canadian Institute news-sheet called Dialogue, announces that a brief is being sent to the Commission on the Relations between Universities and Governments stating that the accounting profession does not regard the relationship it is seeking with universities as one of 'turning over responsibility' but of encouraging the harmonious development of the profession's educational programmes within the university aegis. It stresses the importance in any working relationship that the participants acknowledge their mutual interests and responsibilities as well as their interdependence.

Integrated Final Examination Questions

DIALOGUE also quotes a draft report of a subcommitte of the Canadian Institute's Inter-provincial Education Committee proposing that future uniform final examinations should comprise four papers of from three and a half to four hours each, made up of 'integrated subject-matter and current development' questions. The 'integrated' questions, requiring knowledge of from two to five syllabus areas, would aim at testing the candidate's ability to reason, to identify issues and establish priorities and to relate principles of accounting and auditing to broader business concepts. The subject-matter area would mainly be examined by the provincial Institutes.

UNITED STATES

Incorporation of Practising Firms

IN most States of the American union the formerly prohibiting statutes have been partially superseded to permit practising members of the professions, including CPAs, to form a special type of professional organization or association in which all stockholders are licensed practitioners, reports The Journal of Accountancy (New York) for December, although this is still prohibited by the American Institute's code of professional ethics. One aim is to gain the corporation's right to set up pension plans for officers and employees and deduct the costs from current revenue.

The main incentive, however, derives from the great increase in litigation against professional men in the United States, with claims for enormous sums in damages, and the fact that the accountant's liability is limited only by his last dollar's worth of personal possessions.

An ad hoc committee of the New York State Society of Certified Public Accountants has advocated support for incorporation on these grounds. An analysis made by the American Institute in 1962, through a public relations firm, definitely concluded that incorporation would be damaging, but the Journal seeks the views of CPAs in the changed conditions of today.

Data Bank for CPAs

A CONTRIBUTION of $10,000 towards the cost of starting a bank of empirical research data in accounting at the Graduate Business School of the University of Chicago has been approved by the Executive Committee of the American Institute according to The Journal of Accountancy for January. The American Accounting Association has pledged another $5,000, and other principal accounting groups have expressed interest in supporting the beginning of this research tool. Eventually much of the existing empirical research data in accounting will be coded and converted to standard computer language for storage and retrieval in accounting research.

The encoded data would deal, for example, with actual corporate accounting and reporting methods and their impact on financial statement users, as evidenced by stock-market activity, market price movements and financial analysts' reports. It is believed that there would be vast economies of time and, while development cost would be $55,000 during the first two years, it is hoped that after that many of the costs would be offset by service charges.

LATIN AMERICA

Accounting Newsletter

A new quarterly Spanish language publication, Boletin InterAmericano de Contabilidad (Inter-American Accounting Newsletter) has recently appeared, the aim of which is the improvement of the flow of information on new developments in accounting and related fields among accountants and educationalists in Latin America, Spain and Portugal. Its founder and editor is Dr Stephen A. Zeff, Professor of Accounting at Tulane University, New Orleans.

The Boletin was founded by Dr Zeff because of the apparent lack of a continuing and reliable source, in the Spanish language, which Latin American, Spanish, and Portuguese accountants and educationalists could use in order to keep up to date with developments in their field.

Most accounting literature is available only in English, and much of it may not be relevant to conditions in Latin American countries. It is hoped that the interchange of ideas and experience through the Boletin will lead to a lessening in the wide diversity of practice among these countries.

Financial support for the Boletin is being provided by a two-year grant from the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants and by the Graduate School of Business Administration, Tulane University. In 1970, it is intended that the newsletter will be formally transferred to the Inter-American Accounting Conference, a Puerto Rican-based confederation of accountancy bodies in the Americas.

LEBANON

Fiscal Guide

A USEFUL booklet entitled Fiscal Guide on Lebanon has been compiled by Saba & Co, of Beirut.

Extending to 40 pages, the booklet sets out in detail the various taxes payable upon profits from industrial, commercial and non-commercial occupations, salaries, wages and pensions, and income from movable capital. Other chapters deal with, among other matters, rates on property, municipal taxes, as well as estate and stamp duties. A feature of the booklet is the concise manner in which the material is presented and the inclusion of informative tables.

Finance and Commerce

Centenary

THE accounts of Tomkinsons (Holdings) Ltd first caught this column's eye because the opening page of the report records that 1969 is the centenary year of the original business. The Tomkinson family started in carpet manufacture in 1869 though the accounts from which this week's reprint is taken, were presented at the tenth annual meeting of the present company.

There are three Tomkinsons (one an ICWA member) on the board which is headed by Mr Norman Lancaster, M.B.E., M.A., F.C.A. The report is an extremely businesslike affair, with the 'Report of the Directors' serving the dual purpose of directors' report and chairman's statement. The directors' report is an adequate document which includes a section under the heading 'Trading', on the four home operating companies and on Overseas Carpets Ltd in which Tomkinsons have a 33⅓ per cent interest. Overseas Carpets is a UK incorporated holding company, whose immediate subsidiary, Marlin Carpets Ltd, is a public company quoted in New Zealand.

The accounts, as the reprint shows, are in what is now accepted as 'normal' form, with detail provided in notes which in the original are well set out and are not in that smallest of small print which bigger organizations increasingly seem to be adopting – not always for space reasons.

In the Tomkinson accounts the latest figures are immediately to the right of the narrative, with the comparative figures in blue down the right hand side of each page. This may seem a somewhat strange point to make since that is exactly where the reader would expect to find the figures.

The reader normally reads from left to right, and therefore he reads the narrative first and expects to – and does – find the contemporary figures the next in reading line.

But where does one expect to find the latest, or contemporary, figures in the ten-year record in a company's report? Next to the narrative or farthest from it? Do you, the reader, expect to read through 1959, 1960, 1961, up to 1968? Or do you expect to read 1968 running back to 1959?

In the actual accounts one naturally expects to see the

14. CONTINGENT LIABILITIES
The company has jointly and severally with three other parties, guaranteed the liabilities of Overseas Carpets Limited and its subsidiary for money borrowed up to a maximum of £130,000. narrative, then the 1968 figures, followed by the 1967 comparison; applying that expectation to a longer list of comparative figures, there would then be 1966, 1965 and so on. This, in fact, is how the Tomkinsons five-year record reads, yet somehow it looks wrong.

It does so, probably, only because a descending date order in an historical record is the company reporting exception rather than the rule. But why should it be exceptional when in the accounts proper it is the logical method of presentation?

Growth record

Is ascending, rather than descending, date order the customary method of presenting the historical record simply because the figures are, so to speak, an operation in addition? New figures are added to the old and the oldest are taken out, and since additions in the horizontal are a left-to-right operation, then the historical record becomes left to right.

There is also the point that under conditions of company development, the historical record is one of growth (or so at least every company board sincerely trusts it will be), and here again, growth is a cumulative process which is surely a left-to-right process.

A further point about the Tomkinson five-year record is that it is included in the Report of the Directors and is, in fact, the first exercise in figures one comes across when reading the report from the first page onwards. What saves the reader of the Tomkinson record from reading the wrong (or is it the right?) way round is the point that the record is prefaced by the words 'A number of facts and balance sheet and profit and loss account figures for the group for the year with the corresponding figures for each of the five years are given below'. After that, of course, you would expect to find the 1968 figures first, wouldn't you?

No comparison

AT first reading, the interim report from Meade-Lonsdale Group Ltd, an organization interested in all aspects of the meat trade, is an admission of accounting shortcomings. The report issued on January 30th stated group turnover for the six months to September 30th, 1968, at £7,386,155, with pre-tax profit at £168,516 and net profit at £95,516 after taxation of £73,000.

Immediately under the figures there is the sentence 'No comparable figures are available for the first half of last year but, had they been available, they would, in the board's view, have been similar'. The first few details on the Meade-Lonsdale Group statistical card provide the reason for the absence of comparable figures. The details read: 'Regd. as a private co. 15th March 1967 as Springmount Agricultural Ltd, name changed to above (Meade-Lonsdale Group) 3rd August 1967, acquired whole of the issued capitals of its 9 sub. cos on 1st Sept. 1967 and converted into a public co. 10th Nov. 1967.'

Meade-Lonsdale, in fact, came to the stock-market in November 1967. Naturally the prospectus provided a record of results of the component companies in total for the previous ten years but there is reason enough for the absence of 1967–68 first half figures on a truly comparable basis. The further point made in the interim report is that 'the second half of the year is traditionally better than the first and this will be the case this year'.

CITY NOTES

OVER 30 points off the main share index in the space of two weeks was not the kind of index move to win friends for the equity market. It influenced sellers more than buyers.

For the market, one of the most telling points was that the index showed a net fall after the announcement of the January trade figures which continued the recent see-saw experience of bad and good months. On receipt of the figures, jobbers in the industrial equity market were prepared to mark prices higher but there was next to no reaction on the part of operators to that move.

The following day, prices fell back again. Just what it is that the Board of Trade's 'seasonal adjusters' have injected into the monthly trade figures that gives this alternating good and bad result is a secret of the BOT computer.

The Board insists that the statistic to watch now is the moving three months' average. And since that average shows up reasonably well, it is only natural that attention should be directed to it.

Meanwhile it is absorbing to see the 'on-the-spot' reaction to the monthly figures in Budget forecasting terms. December's figures were immediately translated into a 'tough Budget' but January's, with great alacrity, were translated in term of prospective milk and honey.

The law of recent averages suggests that February's figures will be bad which will presumably bring out bleak Budget forecasts all over again.

* * * *

THE Industrial Reorganization Corporation is once again in the City firing line – this time over its take-over bid for the Brown Bayley company. Having, apparently, failed to talk the bearings industry into voluntary rationalization by mergers, the IRC has itself made a bid for Brown Bayley with the object of later selling off its component steel and bearing parts. Brown Bayley is a holding company, with Hoffman Manufacturing as the bearing subsidiary.

It will be decidedly interesting to see just who is going to buy Hoffman from IRC – and more interesting still to see who is going to buy Brown Bayley's steel subsidiary. The private sector of the steel industry is not exactly a joyous place at present. But the Dunford & Elliott/Hadfields group could be a buyer from IRC.

Set up to organize mergers by persuasion, IRC is getting a name for merger by pontification.

* * * *

THE property industry, at present in the throes of vast merger operations, found something new in such developments with the British Petroleum company bidding outright for the Western Ground Rents company. BP is bidding £18·7 million cash and if successful, as expected, will transfer all the properties of the company to the BP pension scheme whose managers want to increase their property holdings. If anything indicates the extent to which institutions now command the property market this does.

To pension funds, property is certainly a desirable investment and it is accepted that the funds are substantial property buyers and holders. But a straight £18·7 million cash bid for a single property company is something out of the ordinary. It is, at least, out of the ordinary for the time being. Now that BP has made a move, it may not necessarily remain out of the ordinary for long.

* * * *

IN another property deal sphere, the failure of the boards of City of London Real Property Corporation and the Oldham Estate company to agree merger terms has thrown the CLRP take-over operation well and truly into the fire again with Land Securities considered likely to pick CLRP out of the ashes. Disappointment on the Oldham Estate deal was not confined to the CLRP boardroom. In the stock-market it was hoped that a CLRP-Oldham deal would uncover the worth of Oldham and more particularly the worth of Oldham to the George Wimpey construction and property group.

New Posting Trolley

A TROLLEY, capable of accommodating up to four trays of the Manipost visible card filing system, is a new item available from Lamson Paragon. The Manipost cards have the top, right-hand corner cut diagonally to present a visible edge when cards are staggered in echelon across the tray. They cannot move, as they slot into parallel guide rails at the bottom of the tray where the card is filed to suit any position.

There is a large range of stock printings of various forms including records for buying, costing, hire-purchase, production, repairs and also for municipal records.

The 'Manitray', as the new trolley is now called, is part of the integral system of printed cards, and prices will be quoted on request.

Flexible Filing

A NEW, comprehensive range of roll-out compartment trays, drawers, work-tops, and other accessories for high density filing under the name of Dataloc has appeared.

Units can be single- or double-faced with depths of 18 or 34½ inches and standard units are approximately eight feet high, although counter-high units are available. Differing types of documentation can be planned in one unbroken unit to retain file folders, box files, card index systems, stationery, computer print-outs and other items. Cost per filing foot is estimated at about £2 10*s* and can give up to nine lineal feet of filing per square foot of floor space.

Telephone Directory Inquiries on Microfilm

SOME 300,000 entries in the Manchester local telephone directory are being put on to microfilm for a series of trials just starting there with two different types of viewers – manual and automatic.

Directory entries are photographed page by page on to a single transparent sheet of film, called a 'microfiche', approximately 4×6 in. in size, and each page of the directory is reduced to an oblong about one-sixteenth of an inch wide. In the manual system the transparency is moved up or down under the viewer by hand and to find, say, John Smith, the operator slides down to the 'S' row and then across to find the correct page for Smith, John.

In the automatic system, there are a number of transparencies, each of which carries only a part of the Manchester local directory, but by pressing a button the operator selects the transparency containing the wanted surname. On this is an index which indicates the second stage buttons she must press to find the page containing John Smith's number.

This system could be used for all seven million entries in the United Kingdom directories, at present are listed in 62 separate volumes, which Britain's 2,000 directory inquiry operators have to keep on hand.

The trials, in which the two systems will be compared with the existing service using directory volumes, are expected to last a month or so, but they will be weighing the prospects of using microfilm to provide a faster and cheaper directory inquiry service.

Low Cost Photocopier

A NEW photocopying machine – the Copymate – retailing at 14 guineas will produce a completely dry copy for just under one shilling per copy. It will be sold through large departmental and retail stationers.

Marketed by Leed Ltd, the new electrical equipment subsidiary of Lines Brothers, the Tri-ang toy company, the copier should be useful for all small businesses, clubs and similar organizations. Although the cost of copies is high compared with those from larger copiers, there are no chemicals or inks and operation is relatively simple.

Exposure is by the dual spectrum process developed by the 3M Company and packs of the two papers required are sold in sets of 33 for 32*s* 6*d* each.

New Instant Offset Platemaker

A DRAWBACK to the use of offset duplicators for the internal production of letterheadings, invoice forms and office copying requirements has been overcome with the introduction of the Gestetner OE–1 offset platemaker. Capable of producing paper plates from any typewritten, hand drawn or half-tone original, the OE–1 will make a plate in 30 seconds within the office.

A great advantage of the machine is that platemaker and fuser are separate units thus making it possible to touch out any unwanted image prior to fusing.

The OE–1 will transfer an image area of $13\frac{3}{8} \times 9\frac{3}{8}$ in. at a reproduction ratio of 1:1 on a pin bar punched 15×10 in. paper plate. The processor measures $31 \times 19\frac{1}{4} \times 10\frac{3}{4}$ in. and weighs 88 lb. The fuser measures $15 \times 8\frac{1}{2} \times 15$ in. and weighs 15 lb. The complete platemaker and fuser unit costs £545.

A plate, which has been produced on the OE–1 platemaker, is transferred to a small office offset duplicator.

Pneumatic Document Conveyor

ONE of the largest automatic pneumatic tube document conveyor systems in the world has recently been installed in the new terminal at Heathrow Airport. The complete installation will have 68 separate stations using more than $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles of tube, and was constructed to specifications of the British Airports Authority.

Used by BEA, the new terminal will accommodate a total of 120 aircraft movements involving a total of 4,700 passenger movements every hour of operation. One of the major problems was to plan the movement between different departments and aircraft of the passenger and flight documents vital to each departure so as to involve the minimum of manpower and maximum efficiency.

Documents to be transmitted are first placed in a metal carrier and the correct 'address' of the recipient is then selected by turning two metal rings on the carrier to form the correct combination of numbers, and after posting into the chute, the operation is then completely automatic as three electro-mechanical reader exchanges replace the manual operator usually required for re-routing.

The rate at which carriers can be posted into the system is unlimited. A carrier could be placed in each of the 68 stations without causing a blockage, as the relay boards of the reader exchanges store information transmitted by the carrier contacts and stores this until the way is clear. Carriers pass through the tubes at 23 miles an hour and each exchange can handle one movement every 2·5 seconds, more than 2,000 an hour. In this way, human effort is not wasted because of delay.

Hire-purchase by Computer

A NEW hire purchase accounting service for finance companies, called 'FAST' (Finance Account System), has been developed by ICSL in conjunction with Merchandise Funds Co Ltd, the finance house subsidiary of the Harris Lebus group.

During the computer program development, close co-operation with the finance company has resulted in a service which includes all the basic features of hire-purchase and instalment credit accounting in a standard form. This is sufficiently flexible to allow for the incorporation of special reports and analyses to suit individual companies.

This therefore assists a financial company to maximize its gross returns whilst minimizing losses through arrears and bad debts, and brings the advantages normally only enjoyed by the larger finance houses within reach of smaller concerns.

International Computer Services Ltd, Kidsgrove, Stoke-on-Trent, Staffs.

Computer for Great Yarmouth CBC

THE Finance Committee of Great Yarmouth County Borough Council spent nearly two years investigating computer installations and discussed a number of proposals before deciding on a UNIVAC 9300 computer.

This will deal with pay, pension contributions and tax deductions for their employees, as well as the rates for 22,000 ratepayers in the borough. There are also about 40,000 cheques prepared yearly of which there will be a print-out by the computer, together with all the associated cash records. Some 5,000 debtor accounts will also be computerized.

The Council's expenditure is divided under 3,500 headings and its income under 500 headings. This analysis will be prepared for the Treasurer's department, but it is hoped eventually to offer service to all departments including the engineer's, transport, education and libraries departments.

Accountants and SET

Accountancy Bodies' Submissions for the Reddaway Inquiry

The following memorandum has been submitted by the Accountants' Joint Parliamentary Committee to Professor W. B. Reddaway in connection with the inquiry he is conducting on behalf of the Government into the effects of the selective employment tax.

Introduction

THESE submissions are made with respect to the terms of reference of the Reddaway Inquiry which are understood to be as follows:

> 'To examine and report on the effects of the selective employment tax on prices, margins and productivity in industries on which the tax falls as a net burden and the consequent effects on the economy generally.'

It is understood that although the word 'industries' is used above, the inquiry covers the whole of the tax-bearing sector, including professional services.

2. These submissions have regard to the rates of selective employment tax (SET) operative in December 1968.

3. The submissions of the allied accountancy bodies set out in this memorandum fall into two sections to correspond to the above terms of reference, namely, the effect on professional accounting practices and on industry generally.

Effects of the SET on prices, margins and productivity in professional accountancy practices

4. The services rendered by practising accountants include the following:

(i) Accounting and statutory audit work for both the public and private sectors of industry.

(ii) The negotiation of corporation tax, income tax and capital gains tax liabilities on behalf of both sectors and assistance to them in interpreting the bearing of the fiscal statutes on business policy and its implementation.

(iii) Management accounting and consultancy, systems analysis and other techniques designed to secure increased efficiency in the administration of industrial and commercial units especially those in the private sector.

(iv) The verification, as an essential administrative step, of a variety of claims which lead to the disbursement of public money, e.g., investment grants.

The services provided by practising accountants form an essential part of the process whereby the private sector of industry is regulated, taxed and subsidized by the central Government. It therefore appears inappropriate that they should be subject to a tax whose objects include the reduction of their labour force. This was inadequate even before the recent demands made upon practising accountants as a result of Government action, for example the system of taxation on income and profits introduced in 1965 and the investment grants scheme of 1966, claims for which require verification by independent accountants.

5. To classify practising accountants for the purposes of SET as a service occupation in some way distinct from and less essential than the industries they serve would appear to be wrong in principle. Many functions which practising accountants carry out are essential both to industry and to the country in the sense that they derive from statute or from the administrative controls of Government departments. They are not voluntary or optional. That they are carried out by a so-called 'service occupation' derives from the requirement for them to be carried out independently and not from any difference in principle between the work which professional accountants carry out and that done by accountants employed directly by those concerns, in respect of which SET is remitted. The accountancy bodies accordingly submit that the application of SET to practising accountants is contrary to the philosophy of the tax.

6. Accountancy is a labour intensive occupation and accordingly the scope for absorbing the burden of SET is limited. Thus much of the cost of the tax levied on practising firms of accountants falls on industry through increased fees, irrespective of whether the undertaking in question qualifies for refunds on premiums.

7. A substantial part of the training of new entrants to the profession is carried out within practising firms without any form of Government assistance. A majority of those trained in professional offices are later employed in commerce and industry, a substantial proportion of them being employed in manufacturing industry. It is moreover likely that following the Fulton Report the demands of the Civil Services for accountants will substantially increase. There would appear to be no reason why professional accountants should be subjected to additional taxation by means of SET especially as training for other occupations is frequently subsidized by the Government. SET acts as a disincentive on recruitment, especially at the lower levels of salary where it has a disproportionate effect, which in the context of the increasing demands for the services of qualified accountants, is undesirable. It cannot be in the national interest for the accountancy profession to be artificially limited in numbers at a time when the demands of Government and industry for qualified accountants are increasing. SET puts the practising side of the profession at some disadvantage competitively with industry in recruitment

Consequent effects of SET on the economy generally

8. SET is collected in respect of all insurable persons whether or not the employers who suffer the tax qualify for a refund or, in appropriate localities, for a premium. This would appear to be a clumsy and inequitable system. For those undertakings which qualify for refunds or premiums, the effect of the tax is that of a forced loan to the Government which is perpetually renewed. In the opinion of the allied accountancy bodies this is an undesirable by-product of a system of taxation.

9. The collection of SET by means of additions to the already high value of National Insurance stamps increases the practical difficulties of their custody and accounting control. These do not apply in the same manner to other taxes such as income tax deductions from payrolls.

10. It is no secret that there are various steps which an undertaking may legally take to avoid or minimize the incidence of SET. These include the engagement of self-employed contractors in place of direct employees and the redeployment of staff and the physical alteration of premises, with the purpose of taking a particular establishment and those who work there outside the SET net. Many of these arrangements carried out for the purpose of reducing the liability to SET are of no other benefit to industry and may indeed impede efficient operation.

11. If the object of SET is to discourage employment in so-called non-productive occupations, the allied accountancy bodies have seen no evidence that it is succeeding in its purpose. Moreover, they would regard with doubt any statistics showing a transfer of employees from non-qualifying to qualifying industry for the reasons set out in the preceding paragraph unless there is evidence that these factors have been taken into account.

Reviews

The Law Relating to Moneylenders

Fifth edition by Lord MESTON, Barrister-at-law.

Solicitors' Law Stationery Society, 110*s*

Let no one think that a textbook on the law relating to moneylenders is of interest only to moneylenders and those advising them. There have grown up over the years all kinds of companies who lend money at interest and therefore, at least in one sense, are moneylenders but who fervently hope that they are not moneylenders within the meaning of the Moneylenders Act 1900. But they can expect, sooner or later, to come up against a defaulting debtor who pleads the Moneylenders Acts against them.

It is sixteen years since the publication of the fourth edition of this work and many things have happened since then. One very important topic is that of obtaining a certificate under section 123 of the Companies Act 1967, certifying that one is a person bona fide carrying on the business of banking, so as to escape the Moneylenders Acts in that way. Lord Meston has obtained from the Board of Trade details of the questions which they ask of an applicant for their certificate. One of the questions is: 'Have the Moneylenders Acts ever been quoted against you in legal proceedings? If so, please give details.'

Not only companies carrying on finance business but, indeed, anyone proposing to lend money at interest to individuals should have a copy of this book by him.

Essays in the Theory and Practice of Pricing

Institute of Economic Affairs, London, 25*s*.

Two years ago the Institute of Economic Affairs instituted an essay competition in honour of the late Mr Evan Durbin who, but for his premature death would almost certainly have achieved ministerial rank in a post-war Labour Government. The essays were to consider the scope for pricing as a means of maximizing the efficiency of resource allocation. This publication makes available to the public the three winning essays and eleven others.

The essays are mainly by university teachers or post-graduate students in other professions. Particular interest for accountants attaches to the essay awarded first prize; it is on the subject of economic charges for water, and one of its two authors is Mr P. A. Bird, B.SC.(ECON.), A.C.A., senior lecturer in accounting in the University of Kent.

The second prize essay deals with the use of the pricing mechanism for charging the individual with the full social costs of fire risks. Two other essays deal with pricing in the field of refuse collection and for achieving efficiency in electricity supply. Many of these essays are, apart from the intellectual merit they possess, of particular interest to the general reader and non-economist.

London Students' Business Game

AN instructive and stimulating business management exercise – popularly known as a 'business game' – was played by members of the Chartered Accountant Students' Society of London at the head offices of International Computers Ltd at Putney on Friday of last week.

Designed to introduce students to the basic principles of management there was no doubt that the game brought participants face to face with the marketing, production and financial problems of a typical commercial environment. Organized by the Society in conjunction with ICL, the game – based on an ICL 1903A computer – was played by 21 members of the Society who were divided into three 'boards of directors' known as companies 1, 2 and 3.

The adjudicators were Mr Hugh Burnett, A.C.A., Assistant Technical Officer of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and Mr R. S. Williams of ICL.

After an initial briefing session by Mr Williams the three companies, each of which started with total assets of £16 million, set about deciding what to do in the first market situation which was common to them all. Decisions had to be made on the prices to be charged for the products, how much to spend on marketing, what funds to allocate to production, research and development, what capital to invest in new plant and what allowance to make for transport.

The adjudicators, Mr Hugh Burnett, A.C.A., and Mr R. S. Williams (left and right respectively) with Mr Derek du Pré, Secretary of the Society.

Each company completed a decision form at the end of each of the six rounds of the game. The details were read into the computer which calculated the new market position producing a single-page management report for each company. No information was given about the position of the other companies until the end of the 'financial year' at the fourth period when the financial statements of all the contestants were made 'public'.

Pricing policy was a vital factor in the final session and Company 1, although they had a loss of £145,000, were adjudged the winning company with accumulated net profits of £1,635,000. Company 2 were runners-up with an accumulated profit of £945,000.

Edward Victor Amsdon F.C.A., F.C.W.A.

Mr Edward Victor Amsdon, F.C.A., F.C.W.A., former senior partner in Amsdon, Cossart & Wells, Chartered Accountants, of London, who for some years had been living in retirement at East Preston, Sussex, died on January 6th at the age of 86.

M.B. writes:

By the death of Mr E. V. Amsdon, reported to the Council on February 5th, The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales has lost one of its oldest members. A son of the founder of the present firm of Amsdon, Cossart & Wells (of which he himself became in due course the senior partner), he was admitted to the Institute in 1905 and at the time of his death was in his sixty-fourth year of membership.

His standards of professional performance were high. Slapdash bookkeeping irritated him as few other things could; and if he impressed upon his articled clerks the importance of neat and legible working, this was perhaps not the least of the benefits they received at his hands. His praise of their successes was no less warm and memorable.

He took a keen interest in the ancient traditions and privileges of the City of London, which he served for some years as a member of the Court of Common Council. He was also a fellow of The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants, and joint author of two textbooks on costing for the food trades. He was an active member of the Methodist Church which he served faithfully and to the best of his professional ability.

Victor Amsdon was of a generation of accountants whose like we shall not see again and by whose passing the profession is the poorer.

DOUBLE TAXATION RELIEF

Two Draft Orders, The Non-Residents' Transitional Relief from Income Tax on Dividends (Extension of Period) Order 1969 and The Transitional Relief for Interest and Royalties paid to Non-Residents (Extension of Period) Order 1969, were published last week. The Draft Orders are subject to approval by the House of Commons.

The Draft Orders extend respectively the operation of sections 31 and 32 of the Finance Act 1966, in each case by a further period of one year.

DOUBLE TAXATION: JAPAN

A double taxation convention relating to taxes on income between the United Kingdom and Japan was signed in Tokyo on February 10th. On its entry into force the convention will replace the existing double taxation convention between the two countries and the text will be published shortly by HMSO.

Stamp Duties

Mr PRIOR asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will consider the publication of a simple guide to explain the various forms of and liabilities to stamp duties.

Mr HAROLD LEVER: Information regarding the stamp duties with which company officers are most usually concerned is published by the Board of Inland Revenue on Form 11, now under revision. Most of the other duties are of particular concern to professional practitioners for whom commercial publications are available. Details of stamp duties are given in Table 187 on page 307 of the 110th Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue (Cmnd 3508). There has not been any demand for any further official guide.

POST-WAR CREDITS REMINDER

The Board of Inland Revenue has issued a poster drawing the attention of taxpayers to the possibility that some post-war credits already due for repayment may not have been claimed. The poster setting out the categories of persons who may claim repayment is being displayed in tax offices, post offices and other local offices throughout the country.

DECIMAL CHECKLIST

The decimal currency committee of The Institute of Office Management has issued a useful checklist to assist those who are involved in planning and organizing the changeover to decimal currency in their organizations.

The list is divided into two parts. Part I is for the general manager who may be appointed to oversee the operation, and comprises a list of 12 items ranging from initial consideration to arranging finance for machine conversion, deciding pricing policies and training plans. Part II is for the manager responsible for carrying out the operation. It has ten main sections, each of which is subdivided, and lists nearly 150 items which may require consideration in planning for the changeover. Space has been provided for the addition of subjects which may be special to a particular trade or industry.

Copies of the checklist are obtainable price 3*s* each for up to 5 copies; 2*s* 6*d* each for 6 to 20 copies, and 2*s* each for 21 copies or more, from the publications department of the Institute, 167 Victoria Street, London SW1.

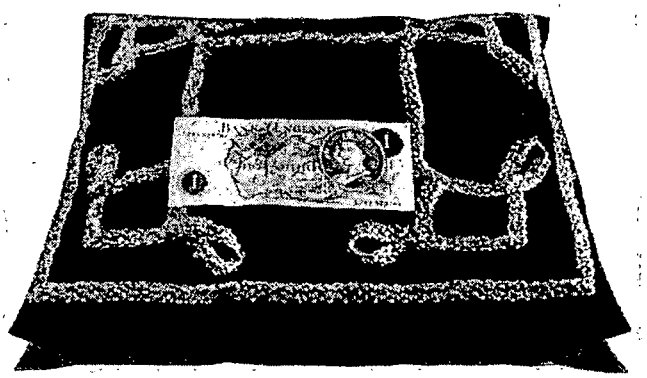
There's 240 million more where this came from



We treat money like royalty, because the money we deal with doesn't belong to us. We have always taken very good care of it—that is one reason why our assets now stand at over £240 million.

Money is safe in Leek and Westbourne's hands. It makes us feel expansive; and that's what we have been doing, are doing and will continue to do .... expand.

Our extending Branch Office network, our widespread Agency representation, and our attention to detail and to our members' individual needs all add up to expansion with security—that's what's called being dynamic.

A Deed of Gratitude

A legacy for the Methodist Homes for the Aged is a means many generous people adopt in expressing gratitude for their own home and for serenity and peace-of-mind in their old age.

There are so many who are less fortunate and for lonely and anxious old people the Methodist Homes for the Aged are a haven and a home. Our constantly growing income from legacies, more than any other factor, has enabled us to embark on the capital expenditure for twenty-eight Homes. Unfortunately even these will accommodate only a few of the hundreds of deserving people on the tragically long waiting list.

We thankfully acknowledge this valuable assistance and ask you please to remember the Methodist Homes for the Aged when advising your clients.

The latest addition to this service of oral tuition consists of study courses for Intermediate and Final students, of one week duration, to be taken about half-way through each stage of their examination preparation. These provide an invaluable opportunity to consolidate the subject-matter studied thus far. Full details of these and other Introductory and Revision Courses may be obtained from:

Ombudsman's Report

WHEN one considers all the publicity which preceded and followed the appointment of the Parliamentary Commissioner – popularly known as the Ombudsman – the reception accorded his activities comes as something of an anti-climax. No doubt, if there were to be a major case involving well-known personalities or major issues, it would be much publicized. In the event, however, as the Second Report of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration (HMSO, 12*s* 6*d*), covering the session 1968–69 clearly demonstrates, a great deal of Sir Edmund Compton's work is concerned with the problems of ordinary people confronted with the machinery of State.

During the past year, 374 cases were investigated and completed, involving 24 Government departments and authorities. It is hardly surprising that the Department of Health and Social Security and the Ministry of Housing and Local Government should provide the largest numbers – 86 and 62 cases respectively – since these departments have greater contact with members of the public than almost any other. The Inland Revenue was involved in 41 inquiries.

In just 10 per cent of 374 cases, the Ombudsman found elements of maladministration which had led to some measure of injustice; it is perhaps noteworthy that one-third of these cases concerned the Inland Revenue. Nevertheless, since there are some 20 million citizens who come within the Inland Revenue net, the total of 13 such cases reflects considerable credit on the department. No doubt it may be argued that not every case in which an individual has felt himself unfairly treated has been brought to the attention of an MP and thence to the Ombudsman.

The report provides some interesting illustrations of the type of complaint referred to the Ombudsman by dissatisfied citizens. Among the Inland Revenue cases are errors in PAYE coding, delays in notifying tax underpayment, failure to effect prompt collection of tax or delay in assessment of surtax. The amounts involved are seldom large but it is precisely because they concern people of limited means that the hardship is all the greater. The mere fact, of course, that these cases have been brought does not necessarily mean the complaint was invariably serious. In some cases a formal apology from the department constituted the appropriate redress.

Press publicity accorded the activities of the Land Commission has not, generally speaking, been favourable. In the past year, however, the Ombudsman was concerned with but three cases affecting the Commission, in only one of which he found an element of maladministration.

Perhaps the most interesting aspect of the numerous cases cited in this report is that they will strike many readers as being relatively trivial, although 'human'. But even if the sums involved were trivial, the principles were not. Such a reaction comes from the tendency nowadays to view such matters from the point of view of the community as a whole, rather than from that of the affected individual. Where injustice extends over a broad band of the community, there is no doubt that public reaction will be sufficiently strong to ensure that it will in due course be remedied.

It is for the individual citizen that the powers entrusted to the Parliamentary Commissioner are important. While, no doubt, it is true that the Courts still remain the citizens' most effective defence, justice in this way is notoriously expensive. There is general agreement on the high quality of administration by Government departments and the integrity of their staffs. Inevitably, however, as contact between these departments and members of the public becomes more frequent as the statutory powers of the State encroach upon the activities of the individual, then occasional mistakes will occur.

The office of Parliamentary Commissioner in this situation is therefore highly important. The only question that remains is whether or not the public is as yet sufficiently aware of its rights in these matters, not to mention the existence of the Parliamentary Commissioner and whether or not it would serve as a useful check on the extensive power of authority of all kinds to increase the number of Ombudsmen. This is a relevant question if, as a result of local government reform, the country is governed by a number of regional 'parliaments'.

As Sir Edmund Compton himself observed in his address to the London and District Society of Chartered Accountants, reproduced in The Accountant of November 2nd last, his appointment is an experiment alone. Nevertheless, it is an experiment of great importance and it is to be hoped that the Press at large will join us in publicizing his activities. None of us should cavil at the cost of his office.

Local Government Finance

WHATEVER may be the outcome of the recommendations of the Royal Commissions on Local Government, the mere re-drawing of local boundaries – or even the creation of regional 'parliaments' – is not going to revive local democracy. To do that the new authorities will need to be made responsible for a range of major services of direct interest to the electorate, and at the same time the new bodies will have to be endowed with adequate financial resources to administer those services. If, as at present, the bulk of the money comes from Exchequer grants, then the degree of local independence and public involvement is reduced.

For years supporters of local government have sought in vain to find an alternative source of revenue to the local rate. Nowadays more attention is being paid to the possibilities of supplementing the rate, and following this approach, The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants has published a series of booklets on possible additional sources of revenue. The latest to appear in the series are Local Income Tax (10*s*) and Local Charges (10*s*). Both studies have been prepared by small research groups of IMTA members.

The attractions of a local income tax as a supplementary source of revenue are considerable. Not merely, as the research group points out, would a 6*d* levy on personal incomes in the UK produce £908 million, but the buoyancy of yield would be sufficient to keep pace with the prospective rate of growth in local authority expenditure. In addition to the charge on personal incomes, the study also advocates a charge on corporate profits by means of a 40 per cent surcharge on the rates payable by such bodies. This would yield in 1968–69 about £162 million.

The group contends that the tax could be administered directly by the Inland Revenue which would then pay over to each regional authority the appropriate amount raised, or by local treasurers' departments on the basis of information provided by the Revenue concerning personal incomes.

The authors are entitled to take this view but it is difficult to believe that the former method makes sense, since the same result could be achieved so much more cheaply by enlarging the Exchequer grants. As for the second, it will not be cheap to administer, and it raises the problem of disclosure to local bodies of individuals' incomes. Lastly, it must be doubted whether the new local authorities would have any discretion as to the rate of levy, in which case the argument for increasing Exchequer grants seems irresistible.

In the study of Local Charges, the research group examine the possibility of charging fees for a variety of services ranging from primary education to libraries and welfare, as well as charging more economic rents for housing and fees for the trading services. The case for such imposts is well made out, not least for any reader who accepts that the principle of universal free provision of services should be replaced by some selective basis.

The weakness of all such proposals, as the study group make clear in their findings, is that even when all these sources are exploited to a reasonable extent, the total benefit in terms of revenue is likely to fall short of £200 million. In relation to rate revenues or Exchequer grants, such a sum is negligible. And in any case it is hardly practical politics to make some charges, e.g., fees for primary school education.

Nevertheless, the fact that such revenues would not by themselves significantly affect the financial relationship between central and local government does not alter the case for charging for certain services. Not even the kindest critic of local authorities would deny that too much expenditure these days is incurred because it is regarded as desirable in itself.

Local government outlays have risen in recent years faster than any other element in public sector expenditure. No one seriously imagines that great economies are available for the taking; but it is surely time to make the economies which are possible.

Farmhouse Expenses

A PIQUANT situation in income tax law has been created by last week's decision of the House of Lords in CIR v. Korner and Others. The House held that expenditure which the Special Commissioners had disallowed to the extent of nine-tenths was allowable in full, notwithstanding that it consisted of money spent on a house which was used for trade purposes for only an hour a day. This startling situation was a result of the drafting of the Income Tax Act 1952, and can hardly have been intended by the Inland Revenue who, indeed, took the taxpayers to the House of Lords in a vain attempt to prevent such a result.

The taxpayers were Professor and Mrs Korner and their three children who owned the estate of Elrig in Wigtownshire, 1,500 acres of which they farmed in partnership. On the estate was the House of Elrig with some 22 rooms, including four bathrooms, all fully furnished. Professor and Mrs Korner lived in the House of Elrig at the request of the three other partners and from there the professor managed the farming, spending usually an hour a day dealing with the records. The day-to-day management on the spot was carried out by an agent or 'factor' who kept the books in his own office. The three children lived elsewhere, visiting the House of Elrig on holidays.

In computing the farming profits for tax purposes the partnership deducted, inter alia, the full expenditure on the rates, repairs and maintenance, and insurance of the House of Elrig. This was challenged by the Tax Inspector and the partnership appealed. The Special Commissioners decided the appeal on the footing that the House of Elrig was the 'farmhouse'. They disallowed nine-tenths of the expenditure on the authority of section 137 (b) of the Income Tax Act 1952 which prohibits deductions in respect of:

> 'any disbursements or expenses of maintenance of the parties, their families or establishments, or any sums expended for any other domestic or private purposes distinct from the purposes of such trade. . . .'

The partnership appealed successfully to the Court of Session which allowed the full expenditure (The Accountant, August 3rd and 17th, 1968). The Revenue appealed to the House of Lords, where the Court of Session's decision was upheld.

Lord Guest said that the application of section 137 (b) was erroneous. The section (which is expressed to be 'subject to the provisions of this Act') contained no warrant for an apportionment of the total expenses between agricultural and non-agricultural purposes. The Inland Revenue, he said, had told the House that, 'by an extra-statutory concession the Revenue allowed deductions in cases where premises were occupied partly for trading and partly for domestic purposes, such as doctors' consulting rooms . . .'. His lordship said that the present was not one of such cases.

He cited section 526 (1) which says: '. . . "farm land" means land in the United Kingdom wholly or mainly occupied for the purposes of husbandry, not being market garden land, and includes the farmhouse and farm buildings, if any, and "farming" shall be construed accordingly'. The words 'occupied wholly or mainly for husbandry' did not qualify the farmhouse, said his lordship. Once a house was the farmhouse it was part of the farm land and part of the trading assets of the husbandry. If that was right, then according to ordinary income tax practice the maintenance of that trading asset was a deductible expense.

Concurring, Lord Upjohn said, according to The Times of February 20th, section 124 (1) directed that all farming was to be treated as the carrying on of a trade. It followed that even apart from section 526 (1), the farmer occupying a house (no doubt with his wife and children) for the purpose of farming activities would be entitled to claim a proportion of the reasonable and necessary expenditure on the maintenance of the house. His lordship did not put this as a 'concession'. A question might some day arise as to whether Parliament did intend that the definition of farm land should apply to a farmhouse which the taxpayer occupied mainly as a week-end residence, though partly for farming.

Lord Donovan, although concurring in the dismissal of the Revenue appeal, had a slightly different approach. He did not think the fact that the farmhouse was treated by the Act as a trading asset ousted the application of section 137, which negatived the deduction of expenditure on non-trading purposes. But the House was here concerned only with rates, repairs and insurance. They were all, prima facie, revenue items necessary to earn the farming profits. Why should they not be allowed?

The Revenue's answer was that the expenditure was laid out for private and domestic purposes, to which the only evidence was that the house was used a good deal by the professor and his family as a private residence, so that much of the expenditure enured to their benefit as residents. But that was immaterial unless such private benefit was the purpose of the expenditure. There was no evidence to displace the legitimate prima facie assumption that the expenditure was for the purpose of the trade alone. Private benefit in the present case was incidental.

The Revenue Need a Breather

GIVING evidence before a subcommittee of the House of Commons Estimates Committee last week, Sir Leonard Barford, the Chief Inspector of Taxes, said that when new legislation was introduced, tax inspectors now had less time to cover everything they thought worth pursuing. Returns suspected of being fraudulent were not always fully investigated. Inspectors either had to select less work or delve less deeply.

Asked whether this had been thrashed out with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr Price, Deputy Chairman of the Board, said the Chancellor was well aware of the situation. Mr Edward Leadbitter, a member of the committee, said 'Awareness is delightful, but what is he doing about it?'

Mr Price replied that what could be done would be to persuade the Chancellor and other Ministers to give the Inland Revenue a breathing space to absorb the extra work caused by the new legislation. More staff was a longer-term solution. It took at least five years to produce a qualified inspector. Sir Leonard said it was a very exacting job, demanding a combination of character and self-reliance with a degree of intellectual discipline equal at least to a second-class honours degree.

A main deterrent to recruitment was the public image of the inspector. There was also the necessity for mobility and the requirement of two stiff departmental examinations in the first three years.

Statute Users Launch Inquiry

AN investigation into the defects of the present system of framing, enacting and publishing Acts of Parliament has been started by the Statute Law Society. The Society has set up a committee under the chairmanship of Mr Desmond Heap, Comptroller and City Solicitor of the City of London, and representative of users of statute law in commerce, industry, the professions and local government. The accountants on the committee are Mr E. C. Meade, F.C.A., representing the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, and Mr D. C. Hobson, M.A., F.C.A.

The task of the committee, which expects to report by the end of 1969, will be to assemble the grievances and complaints of statute law users and present them in the form of a logically-arranged and comprehensive analysis. The report, which will be published, is intended to form the basis for detailed proposals for reform. These proposals will be worked out by another committee to be set up by the Statute Law Society later this year.

The Society recognizes the immense task facing reformers in this field. It is convinced, however, that reforms are essential and that they would have beneficial effects for the economy of the country and in many aspects of national life. Unnecessary obscurity in the law and inadequacies in the system of publishing laws, greatly increase the cost of legal services and cause delay and frustration.

The Society is anxious that as many users of the statute law as possible, who have experience of these problems, will send details to Mr Desmond Heap, 16 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London WC2, before March 31st, for the consideration of the committee. To be most effective the submissions should give specific illustrations or points of complaint.

Dail Questions on Irish Institute's Examinations

THE heavy failure rate in the December Final examination of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland was the subject of questions in the Dail last week.

The Minister for Education was asked on Wednesday whether his attention had been directed to the course of education prescribed for the qualification of chartered accountant; whether he was satisfied that the urgent need of the country for qualified accountants was adequately catered for educationally; whether he was aware that in the most recent examination in Part 5 of the Irish Institute's Final examinations over 85 per cent of the candidates failed to qualify; and whether in the light of these considerations he would discuss the educational implications of these matters.

Mr Lenihan said The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland was an autonomous body and he had no formal function in relation to it. He understood, however, that the Institute was formulating a scheme for the development of the accountancy profession in Ireland. This was part of a joint effort with the other major accountancy bodies, he said. The Institute hoped thereby to establish closer links between all the bodies concerned and to standardize training procedures and educational requirements. In this context preliminary discussions had taken place between representatives of the Institute and his department regarding the entry and other educational requirements of the Institute.

The Minister added that the high failure rate in Part 5 of the ACA examination held in December 1968 was a source of concern to the Institute itself and it was endeavouring to ascertain the cause of it.

Mr Dillon asked if the Minister did not agree that a professional course upon which young Irish men and women were invited to embark, which had an 87 per cent pass rate in the first year, 63 per cent in the second year, 49 per cent in the third year, and 15 per cent in the fifth year, must be a badly administered course. He suggested that the course should be reformed in order to eliminate, in its early stages, unsuitable candidates and not have them continue until they were 23 or 24 years of age before they found that they could not pass the Final examination.

The Minister said that this situation had arisen because of the laudable desire on the part of the Institute to raise the standards. At the same time he was also concerned about the progression downwards as regards results. That was why his department and the Institute had come together to try and evolve a more rational system of education.

Questions in Parliament

WITH the Budget looming nearer the Chancellor's question time in Parliament next Tuesday will be lively and full of suggestions for his consideration in the following four weeks.

Among those tabled is one from Mr Stratton Mills (Ulster Unionist, Belfast North) who wants Mr Jenkins to undertake a study of the position of retired persons living mainly on investment income, having regard to the level at which surtax commences in these circumstances compared with the position of other retired persons whose income is classified as earned.

But Mr Peter Mills (Cons. Torrington), wants more immediate action: namely, the replacement of selective employment tax and purchase tax by some form of general sales tax in the Budget. The reply is entirely foreseeable – the impossibility of anticipating the forthcoming Budget.

Mr Donald Williams (Cons. Dudley), is to ask for special tax relief or repayment of interest charges to all businesses required to lend money to the Treasury under the terms of selective employment tax and the import deposit scheme.

Minister at Pensions Conference

MR RICHARD CROSSMAN, Secretary of State for Social Services, was principal speaker at a conference held on Monday of last week to discuss the Government's White Paper on its proposals for earnings-related social security. The conference was organized by the National Association of Pension Funds, whose members administer non-insured occupational pension schemes.

Whilst, said Mr Crossman, the main structure of the scheme was firm, this was a White Paper 'with green edges'. He was very ready to listen to public opinion and to make modifications.

Dealing with criticisms and suggestions regarding the scheme, Mr Crossman said that powerful arguments had been put forward from different quarters that contributors to the existing graduated scheme should be allowed a refund of their contributions, provided they invested such refunds until retirement. This, said Mr Crossman, would cost an appreciable amount of money but it was something which he would bear very much in mind.

On the subject of partial contracting-out from the new scheme, Mr Crossman said that he wanted to encourage private occupational schemes. On the other hand, the State scheme would not be able to afford too much contracting out. A balance would have to be struck in the negotiations with interested parties (which have already started), and he made it clear that the terms could not be so generous that all employers would contract out.

In reply to a question from a member of the Association as to whether it was proposed that employees' contributions should be set off against income tax, as in the case of contributions to an occupational scheme, Mr Crossman said the answer was 'No' as the law stood at present. He appeared to think it unlikely that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be prepared to alter this aspect of the law. Mr Crossman said he appreciated this was one of the less popular proposals and he added that this point would be taken into consideration when settling terms for partial contracting-out.

On the question of late retirement, Mr Crossman said he aimed to give better value for money under the new scheme than at present.

THIS IS MY LIFE

Leaving 'the Profession'

by An Industrious Accountant

THE auditors had come for an interim check on the books and during some desultory conversation it was remarked that I probably wouldn't be seeing young Clarence again. He had just accepted a job as chief accountant in a small local factory. He was going into industry.

Clarence, four years' qualified, was complacently self-satisfied. Small, yes, but progressive; with aggressively dynamic top management, he asserted. He'd been on the two preceding audits there and rather fancied that the general manager, quite a genial chap, had taken to him. Anyhow, the offer had come suddenly from this bird – in quite flattering terms, too, rather to Clarence's surprise. Still, the prospects looked attractive down the road; he'd give it a twirl for a year or so and see how this shop-floor business appealed to him.

Life in the manufacturing mêlée had its problems, I commented; I'd be very happy to help if he had any queries. Clarence hadn't. He'd play it along, he said; just a matter of softly, softly, catchee monkey, not to worry. In fact, he was just a trifle upstage with us.

I remembered my own first venture into industry. Not unlike Clarence's case, the offer had come absolutely out of the blue from the chairman. The company was new, the premises still in course of construction, the plant only partially unpacked. It was a subsidiary, so the direction, planning and so on, would come from head office. Every help would be given me, the chairman had said with old-world courtesy, and he hoped we'd have many happy and successful years together.

Well, I was jubilant but apprehensive, and more than conscious of my limited experience since qualifying. Textbook stuff was available, routine procedures I knew, my former office colleagues could be relied upon to respond helpfully to a telephone SOS about tax reserves or stock control, but there must be more to industry than that. Perhaps a book of hints for nervous chief accountants? . . . I went to consult our senior partner.

You'll be all right, don't worry; just pick it up as you go along, he smiled. His smile was mechanical, his mind detached – already planning my replacement on the audit no doubt. Books about possible pitfalls? He offered a choice of volumes from his shelf, if necessary, Spicer and Pegler, Carter, Munro.

He was non-committal when I inquired about the new unknown directors, their background, their outlook, their likely reactions. I remember feeling acutely conscious that to him these directors were friends and clients, but I was merely his clients' employee.

So I visited our junior partner, who sported a small moustache and rode horses. He put his fingers together, pursed his lips and warned me about the importance of establishing my position as early as possible. The chief accountant's status should be clear-cut from the first, he admonished me. Don't be over-familiar with your staff or you risk prejudicing discipline; let your directors see that you represent a great profession even though you take their instructions; finally – and somewhat incongruously – look for a girl with land. Land in hunting country was a supreme asset; it holds immense social advantages.

No, he couldn't recall any books about accountants offhand. He himself would have preferred politics, if he'd wanted to jack up the profession, but I should be well able to cope with trade, dash it. I departed, despondent.

Last week I heard on the grapevine that Clarence was on the breadline. He'd slipped up on some minor incentive-bonus calculation; the harassed general manager, suddenly far from genial, had given him both barrels there and then in front of the shop stewards, and Clarence had put status before prudence. 'No Lord High Muckamuck stuff with me', growled the GM, who might well have grinned apologies if handled differently; and so alas, poor Clarence!

He'll have no trouble in finding another job in practice, of course, but next time he may be glad to listen to those who've caught a few monkeys in their time.

PENSIONS

for

SALARIED DIRECTORS AND EXECUTIVES

This plan enables employers to make suitable pension provisions for their key executives or to supplement provisions at present being made when these are thought to be inadequate.

In the event of death before retirement on pension a cash sum (normally of about ten times the expected pension) is payable and this is often entirely free of Estate Duty.

At retirement at least one quarter of the pension may be exchanged for a tax-free cash sum.

The plan may be arranged to participate in the profits of the Institution thereby making some allowance for future increases in salaries and pensions.

Professional Training or Professional Education?

by GORDON WAINWRIGHT, B.A.
Head of Department of Liberal Studies
West Park College of Further Education, Sunderland

THE proposed modifications in the system of examinations for the accountancy profession, outlined in the 'future plans' scheme presents an opportunity for a fundamental reappraisal of the aims and methods, as well as of the content, of the training scheme. What kind of balance should there be between training for particular functions and general further education? Is it enough to provide young accountants only with knowledge and skills related to accountancy as such, or should they also pursue studies that will enable them more readily to move from one branch of accountancy to another, or even into an entirely different field altogether at a later stage in their careers? The choice is between professional training on the one hand and professional education on the other.

The trouble with the present-day systems of professional examinations is that they tend to encourage training rather than education. It is always difficult, of course, to distinguish precisely between the two; but it is probably fair to say that training is narrow in conception, specific in approach and functional in its results. Education, on the other hand, tends to be concerned with broader interests for their own sakes and does not set out to achieve a clearly predetermined end. Training involves reaching a series of objectives; education is a continuing and open-ended process.

Professional examinations are not alone in placing restrictions on educational processes but they make it pertinent to ask whether modern business and industry require trained or educated professional men and women. There are sound arguments in favour of training, especially at the present time with the increasing emphasis on commercial and industrial training following in the wake of the Industrial Training Act.

Scope for improvement

There isan obvious need for training in professional skills and this applies with equal force to accountants as to others. It might even be argued that the present system does not provide the kind of training needed nor provide it in the most effective manner. Recent developments in job and skills analysis have revealed inadequacies and inefficiencies in training in many fields in industry. It is possible that systematic analysis of professional training needs would not only reveal shortcomings but would also indicate the methods by which improvements might be achieved. We might even find that we needed more training rather than less, especially if we are to prepare people for future as well as present requirements.

There is a need to provide professional men and women with opportunities for training in the use of communication skills. There is always scope for improvement here and the more effectively workers at all levels in business and industry can communicate, the greater the contribution to efficiency and productivity. Certainly, those who wish to proceed from specialist functions to general management will find the path easier if they are effective communicators.

Right mixture?

A third important training area lies in subjects and areas of knowledge and experience related to one's main vocational concern. There are always background studies to be pursued if complete mastery is to be achieved; but the question which has to be asked is whether this mixture of training in professional skills, communication skills and vocationally related studies is enough. Does it provide modern business and industry with the kind and quality of accountants it needs? The case being argued here is that all professional men and women have educational needs which require something in addition.

Accountants – like scientists and technologists – are specialists. Specialists, in the course of their personal development, require a compensating breadth so that they can make decisions in a proper context. In the development of scientists and technologists this need was recognized some 15 years ago. In 1954, what used to be called the Ministry of Education (now the Department of Education and Science) issued a circular entitled Liberal Studies in Technical Colleges and began a quiet revolution in further and higher education which has resulted in the provision of educational as well as training opportunities for these specialists.

But scientists and technologists are not alone in needing an extension of the general education provided during compulsory primary and secondary education. All specialists have similar needs. In fact, all workers at all levels in business and industry need these liberal studies to make them aware, for instance, of their social as well as their company responsibilities. But they are particularly necessary for those who are likely to proceed to supervisory or managerial functions.

The central aim in introducing liberal studies into the professional education of accountants would be to put accountancy into a context. The concern would be with the personal, social and cultural (in the widest sense of the word) development of accountants and the content of these studies would seem to involve the study of five main areas of human activity. First, there would be a need for communication studies in which training in the use of communication skills could be related to the wider issues of human relations and personal relationships. Secondly, studies of various aspects of knowledge and achievement in the arts and the humanities would help accountants to increase their awareness, knowledge and understanding of the principal developments in thought and creative activity which have influenced the growth of society. Thirdly, social studies would enable them to see the profession of accountancy in its social context. Scientific and technological studies would, fourthly, enable them to develop their awareness of the role of accountancy in contemporary and future commerce and industry. Finally, the study of current affairs would complete the picture and enable accountants to discuss many of the problems which, directly and indirectly, will affect those who progress to senior positions in general administration.

Methods of teaching require to be imaginative and need continuing experiment if the natural resistance to what may appear to be 'unnecessary' additions to the process of training are to be overcome. Though as liberal studies would probably not exceed 10 per cent of training time, the resistance might well be less than would be supposed.

Broader approach

In conclusion, it might perhaps be appropriate to stress that accountants are not alone in needing a broader approach to vocational preparation. Such an approach could, however, lead accountants to an awareness of our changing society which could enable them to improve their contribution towards its development. It would also provide them with the skills and background necessary for success in general management. This approach would mean better accountants because it would mean accountants who could more effectively see their work in its complete economic, social and cultural context.

This is, after all, what the proposals for professional education in the scheme for the development of the accountancy profession are seeking to achieve, and is indeed the only way in which accountants can establish themselves as a profession with a voice which ought to be heard. Let us hope that the potential contribution of accountants is not limited in any way by a restricted approach to their training, taken on grounds of false economy or misguided beliefs that only what is clearly useful merits a place within the training programme. If the new scheme is indeed to be 'bold and imaginative', as The Accountant has commented, it cannot afford to be narrowly conceived or constructed.

Auditing in Europe

by C. ROMER-LEE, M.A., F.C.A.

THIS subject is too large to be covered in much detail in a short paper, so let me say at the outset that my comments are confined to some aspects of auditing and the accountancy profession as they are found in certain countries of Western Europe.

The concept of auditing, as it is known today in Britain or America, is not understood on the Continent; but interestingly enough the idea of having an independent review of a company's accounts is found in nearly every country. Thus it is fairly common to find that the appointment of an 'auditor' for companies over a certain size is either compulsory by statute or required by commercial considerations. It is in the duties and responsibilities expected of the auditors in different countries that wide variations occur, as well as in the interpretation of the word 'independent'.

It is, of course, common knowledge that in Britain, since 1948, auditors have been required by law to report whether in their opinion a set of accounts gives a 'true and fair view' of the position at a certain date and of the results for the period ended on that date. No such specific requirements are demanded from the auditors appointed under the laws of most Continental countries.

In Britain too, those eligible for appointment as auditors are specified in the Companies Acts and are expected to be properly qualified to carry out their duties. This is not always the case on the Continent. In Belgium, France and Italy, for instance, one or more of the statutory auditors of a company must be selected from an official list of approved persons who need not necessarily have had a professional accountancy training. On the other hand, in Germany and Switzerland companies over a certain size must have their accounts examined annually by independent professional accountants who would normally be members of one of the professional bodies of accountants in those countries.

An address given at the Auditing Conference of the London and District Society of Chartered Accountants at Eastbourne in November.

The standard expected from the statutory auditors in various countries can perhaps be illustrated by quoting from some typical reports. Here I am indebted partly to a book entitled Professional Accounting in 25 Countries published by the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants.

Belgium

A typical report might read:

'In accordance with clause . . . of the statutes, we have examined the balance sheet at . . . and the profit and loss account for the year and confirm that they are in agreement with the books of account. We have satisfied ourselves as to the existence of cash at banks and investments and received such information as we required concerning the other items in the accounts.

'Our examination having been completed to our satisfaction, we propose that the balance sheet and profit and loss account as submitted by the board of directors be adopted by the stockholders.'

France

A new company law in France dated July 24th, 1966, came out exactly 99 years after the previous one which was dated July 24th, 1867. Under this law, which took effect from October 1st, 1968, the auditor is required to submit three reports, one to the board of directors setting out the auditing procedures and tests that he has used, explaining any modifications to the balance sheet which appear to him to be necessary and dealing with any errors or frauds that he has discovered. This report must summarize the effect of the foregoing on the results for the year compared with those of the previous year.

The other two reports are rendered to the shareholders, one reporting on the truth and accuracy of the financial statements, and the other (known as the 'special' report) referring to agreements and contracts existing between the company and any of its directors (either directly or indirectly). In order to carry out their new duties satisfactorily they are given wide powers of investigation and can employ expert assistance.

This latter departure is of great significance when one remembers that up till now a member of the French professional accountancy body has been allowed to employ only five people and that the British concept of partnership is completely unknown. To be fair, though, one must add that the whole concept of professional partnerships is undergoing a basic change in France.

Italy

A typical report might read:

'The balance sheet and income statement at . . . which the board of directors presents to you, closes with a profit of Lire . . . and appear to us, following a close examination, to be prepared on the basis of the accounting results and in accordance with legal provisions, by which the criteria for the valuation of the assets have been observed.

'In view of the fact that the accounting, the records, the cash and the securities, on the basis of our periodic examination, have been found to be kept correctly, we conclude, recommending for your approval, the balance sheet, the income statement and the proposal of the board of directors to distribute the profit.

'We thank you for the faith with which you have honoured us.'

Switzerland

The Swiss Code of Obligations lays down the duties of auditors thus: the auditors determine whether the balance sheet and profit and loss statement agree with the books, whether the books are properly kept and whether the information as to the operating results and the financial position of the company complies with the requirements of the law as to valuation and with any special provisions of the articles of association.

A typical report might read:

'To the General Meeting of the shareholders of XYZ, A.G.

'As duly appointed statutory auditors of your company we have examined the balance sheet at December 31st, 1967, and the profit and loss account for the business year 1967 submitted to us and have found them to be in agreement with the company's books. As a result of our audit we confirm that the books have been properly kept and that the financial statements give a true and fair view of the company's financial position at December 31st, 1967, and the results of its operations in conformity with the principles of evaluation prescribed by the law and the company's articles of association.'

The net income for the year amounts to		.....
To which should be added the balance brought forward amounting to		.....
		.....
The directors propose that this sum be dealt with as follows:
Transfer to legal reserve ..	.....
Payment of a dividend of %	.....
and to carry forward the balance of		.....

'We recommend that you approve the accounts at December 31st, 1967, and the directors' proposals for dealing with the available retained earnings.'

The Netherlands

No specific form of report is specified either by law or by the Netherlands Institute of Register-Accountants. One can even find the 'report' consisting solely of the auditor's signature, sometimes accompanied by the words 'audited and approved' or merely 'approved'. Exceptions or qualifications would start with the words 'Subject to . . .'.

Germany

The standard form of auditors' report recommended by the Institut der Wirtschaftsprüfer states that:

'on the basis of the examination of the books and records of the client and explanations received from the management the accounting and the financial statements are in accordance with legal requirements'.

In addition, the auditor of an A.G. (roughly the equivalent of our public company) is required to produce a large report dealing with accounting procedures, internal control, movements in items on the balance sheet as well as statistics of sales, production, capacity utilization, numbers of employees, and so forth.

Thus, although it is fairly common in Continental Europe to find references to the accounts being in agreement with the books, and to their conformity with legal requirements, the absence of any reference to a 'true and fair view' is noticeable. It is true to say, though, that in Switzerland and the Netherlands a fair presentation is implied either specifically or by omission.

I am glad to notice that the Companies Act 1967 goes some way along this line of thinking by reducing the number of matters which have to be mentioned specifically by an auditor. It is interesting to note in passing that in Italy the Board of Statutory Auditors (Sindici) have to attend the meetings of the board of directors and are jointly liable with them whenever injury would not have occurred if the auditors had exercised due vigilance. They cannot therefore be said to be independent of management.

Unusual responsibility

The requirement in Switzerland for the auditors to recommend the shareholders to accept the dividend proposed by the board seems an odd responsibility for them to undertake; perhaps it conforms with the traditional conservatism and financial prudence associated with that country.

With such a wide variation in reporting requirements, it is not surprising that some effort should be made to look into the position to see if there is any possibility of rationalizing the situation. It is as if some unseen power came along and whispered that into this chaotic jungle there must come a leavening influence. Thus there came into being the Union Européenne des Experts Comptables Economiques et Financiers, known for short as UEC. This was founded in 1951 by certain accountancy bodies in Austria, Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, Luxemburg, Portugal, Spain and Switzerland.

However, it was not until 1963 that the three Chartered Institutes in the British Isles, The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, the professional bodies of the Netherlands and those of the four Scandinavian countries felt able to join. Professional bodies of 17 countries are now members of UEC, if we allow ourselves to count Scotland and Ireland separately.

I do not propose to go into details as to why it took over ten years for UEC to reach its present membership. I had no part in the negotiations which went on during that period but from what I have been told by those who were close to them it seems that the bodies who did not join at the beginning had serious reservations as to the proper functions of UEC. Under the original scheme, the independence and status of the various accounting bodies in Europe might have been seriously affected; in addition, some of the original members were bodies who were just not recognized by the British, Dutch or Scandinavians. However, it became clear that to make sense of UEC, it was essential that the accountancy bodies in these countries should join.

This point of view in the course of time came to be generally accepted and it was largely due to the efforts of the then President of UEC, Dr Elmendorff of the German Institute, that a revised constitution was adopted in December 1962 which accorded more with the views of the bodies which had remained aside at the beginning. This opened the way for the British, Dutch and Scandinavian bodies to join – a step which they all took during 1963. The constitution was again revised in March 1965, Articles I and II of which now read:

Article I. Origin and Definition

1. The Union Européenne des Experts Comptables Economiques et Financiers, founded on November 16th and 17th, 1951, in Paris, is the association of professional organizations representing in the various European countries the 'experts comptables economiques et financiers' who have an adequate professional training and who observe in the practice of their profession both the principle of independence and that of personal responsibility. The expression 'experts comptables economiques et financiers' for the purpose of the present constitution means, irrespective of the professional descriptions to which they are entitled within their countries of origin, those professional persons who perform the functions of auditors and advisers of business undertakings.

2. The seat of UEC is in Paris.

Article II. Objects

The Union Européenne des Experts Comptables Economiques et Financiers shall pursue the following objects:

(a) to facilitate exchanges of views among experts comptables economiques et financiers on all problems which are referable to their professional competence;

(b) to promote the progress of methods of business management and especially of accounting and auditing techniques by fostering research into the most rational and efficient practices;

(c) to compare the national systems of professional education and training, and of admission to the profession, with a view to European co-operation;

(d) to examine the conditions under which experts comptables economiques et financiers may be admitted to carry on, either permanently or occasionally, their profession or a particular assignment in a foreign European country;

(e) to study the ethical principles to be observed by the experts comptables economiques et financiers of the various European countries in the practice of their profession;

(f) to foster and maintain relations with institutions for supranational co-operation whose activities are of interest to the profession;

(g) more generally, to take every initiative appropriate to create a spirit of solidarity among the experts comptables economiques et financiers of European countries and to work in common to improve their conditions and methods of work.

Here we see that UEC is now established as an association of professional accountancy organizations, the members of which observe the principles of independence and personal responsibility.

As I indicate elsewhere in this paper, progress is desperately slow and it seems to me that it will be a very long time before the British concept of an auditor's independence, and what we mean by a set of accounts giving a 'true and fair view', become generally accepted in Europe. All the same, it is interesting to look at the list of subjects which are at present being examined by committees of UEC. According to the Secretary-General's report for 1967 there are nine committees dealing with the following:

Auditing, with particular reference to the presentation and auditing of group accounts.

External Financial Reporting – Accounting Principles and Practices.

Management Information Processing, with four subcommittees which are studying:

(i) The impact of automatic data processing on management.

(ii) Cost information.

(iii) Budgeting control as an instrument of management.

(iv) The impact of automatic data processing on internal control.

Business Economics and National Economics.

Accounting Law.

Taxation, with particular reference to the role and bearing of fiscal considerations in investment decisions concerning fixed and working capital.

Lexicography.

Professional Ethics.

Education.

Some of these committees are working towards producing papers or other reports for presentation to the forthcoming Sixth UEC Congress to be held in Copenhagen in October 1969. The list is comprehensive and it will be interesting to see how the results of these committees' work contribute to the furtherance of UEC's objects as set out in Article II of its constitution.

As I have said, progress within UEC must inevitably be slow. Different languages and local customs all take time to assimilate to a common denominator. The Record of Proceedings of the UEC Fifth Congress held in Vienna in 1964, which was published in English in 1967, shows the widely differing views held on such subjects as budgetary control, a standardized plan of accounts, and the presentation of annual accounts of businesses and groups of businesses. At the time of that congress the British Institutes had only recently become members of UEC; they had not participated in the preparation of any of the papers presented but were invited to send observers to comment on them. In these comments phrases such as 'a true and fair view' and 'consolidated balance sheet of the group' stand out as beacons lighting the direction of future progress.

Another factor which helps to leaven the concepts of accounting and auditing on the Continent is the presence of a considerable amount of British and American investment. In the earlier part of this century, Britain led the way but in the last 20 years or so American companies have made substantial investment on the Continent. The total of such foreign investment is unascertainable, but M Jean Jacques Servan-Schreiber has made an attempt to assess its extent in France and some other countries in his book The American Challenge, recently published in English.

While writing from an admittedly biased standpoint, Mr Schreiber takes pains to point out the benefits of foreign investment in Europe, particularly when it is accompanied by improved techniques and standards. In fact, he is definitely critical of European concerns which will not adopt the advanced methods taught them by some of their American competitors.

International Accounting Firms

Following closely behind British and American capital have come the international accounting firms, whose role was to help the investor safeguard his capital by seeing that the results reported to him gave a true and fair view of what was going on. The growth in recent years of the Continental practices of firms such as mine has followed closely behind the increase in American investment. Generally speaking we make careful inquiries before accepting work from local clients, although naturally the policy in this regard varies from firm to firm and from country to country. There are two principal reasons for this philosophy; first, we are foreigners and so have to be careful not to run up against the local accountancy profession by appearing to take work away from its members; secondly, few local clients are prepared to pay the fees which have to be charged to carry out an audit up to the standards required by the British and American professions.

However, when a British or American client acquires control of a local business he usually wants an audit carried out and it is in this way that the professional standards common to Britain and the US are finding their way into Continental commercial practices. The application of such auditing procedures does not pass unnoticed by local concerns, even if they are wholly owned by a British or American parent company, for most of the senior management usually remains untouched, except perhaps for the addition of one or two key men representing the new owners.

New methods of financial control and new auditing procedures are thus being brought directly to the notice of many responsible and intelligent businessmen in Europe. Some are definitely cynical and unimpressed, but more and more are seeing the value of sound financial controls and independent audits. For instance, we have recently been engaged to examine and report on the accounts of a fairly large business on the Continent in an industry which is becoming technologically obsolete. The object is to help management to decide what is the best thing to do with what is left of the company's assets.

Again, a British client instructed us to report on the affairs of a group of companies operating in several Continental countries. In the course of our work we prepared the first-ever consolidated balance sheet of the group. The local proprietors were so impressed by such a picture that they have engaged us to do a similar exercise on another group of companies.

The need for improvement is illustrated by some of the situations which one finds when asked to investigate a business on behalf of a prospective purchaser, or even after a client has been subject to an independent audit for several years. It is fairly normal practice to find that an informal commentary report is rendered to the client after each audit, dealing mainly with weaknesses in internal control. Here are some of the matters which in my experience have had to be drawn to clients' attention, and references to certain ways of dealing with them.

Bank balances

It is not uncommon to find a company banking with a large number of banks. I think the record number I have heard of is 72. One can understand, therefore, why checking bank reconciliations can take a long time. Banks will nearly always reply to requests for confirmation of balances but sometimes it is a matter of trial and error before the right figure is confirmed.

Incidentally, it is not the practice for Continental banks to return paid cheques to their customers and they are very loathe to part with them. This means that an auditor has to make an appointment (with the client's permission) to visit the bank to examine a selection of paid cheques if he wants to include this test in his audit procedures. Sometimes banks will provide photocopies but often at a charge of 2*s* to 3*s* a copy. In any case this audit test can be very unsatisfactory because so many cheques are made payable to bearer.

Petty cash

It is rare to find petty cash kept on an imprest system and frequently moneys received are put into the petty cash box. Vouchers are often not authorized – sometimes even non-existent – and are frequently uncancelled so that they could be produced for another payment of a similar amount.

Payrolls

Difficulties arise in the wages and salaries records due both to omission and inclusion, more frequently the former. It is not usual to find fictitious names on the payroll because in many countries there are high social security charges which have to be paid by employers. These can be as high as 35 per cent of gross salary in France, or 45 per cent in Italy.

We have found cases where the payroll does not reveal the whole of a person's salary. In one case, in fact, the salaries officially disclosed were carefully kept low enough so that no personal income tax was payable by any employee. The balance of the individual's income was paid in the form of periodical bonuses which at that time were not subject to income tax in the hands of the recipient.

Another way in which personal income tax is avoided is by having part of a person's salary paid through unofficial books. It is relatively frequent to find that a set of unofficial or 'black' books exist. Through these books are passed part of the sales of the business, this money being then used to make unofficial payments of all kinds; call them what you like – bribes, commissions, bonuses – they all manage to evade the normal channels of assessment to personal income tax.

Sales

The suppression of sales from the main books of account is made easy by the prevalent habit of not prenumbering the sales invoices or the goods issued from stores notes.

Another way to do this is to issue a credit note for the amount of cash which by-passes the main books, a procedure which is made relatively easy if credit notes are not approved by a senior official who may or may not be in collusion with the customer.

Stocks and work in progress

The amounts at which stocks are stated in a balance sheet is always a matter of judgement and opinion. Even in the UK there can be more than one opinion on a particular item of stock which is genuinely held and acceptable. It can be imagined, therefore, what can happen in countries where opinions are not subject to such rigid disciplines as are found in best professional practice on British Standards.

In countries where auditors are not required to express an opinion on the truth and fairness of the picture given by a set of accounts, tax requirements often influence the way in which published accounts are presented. In some countries it is permissible for tax purposes to write large amounts off stocks – also off fixed assets – in the year of acquisition; such practice is recognized and understood and may not even find a mention in the accounts because it is expected to have been followed unless otherwise stated.

In other countries, where there is no recognized basis of stock valuation, the amount put against this heading in a balance sheet can either be the result of intelligent guess-work or careful calculation. In either case it will usually be the balancing figure required to show the profit the proprietors wish to reveal for tax purposes. Tax inspections occur at regular intervals but it is surprising how often excessive prudence in stock valuations seems to win the day!

From our point of view the fun begins when a client gets interested in acquiring a local business where stocks form even a relatively small proportion of the assets. In order to justify what is always a high asking price, the seller has to disclose his true profits. Where he has done some careful calculations there are usually reliable documents available in support. Where there has been too much guess-work (even though it appears to have been extremely intelligent) we find ourselves unable to express any opinion on the profits of past years. In most cases, though, it is possible to construct a balance sheet at a recent date which gives a reasonably true and fair view.

This, however, can only be the beginning of the story. If the deal goes through the new owners will expect future accounts to show a true and fair view; but to bring all past undisclosed profits into one year's profit and loss account would be disastrous. So for a few years, possibly three or four, one finds two sets of accounts being prepared – the one on which we would report showing a true and fair view; the other filed for local tax purposes bringing in the undisclosed profits gradually over the period so that no one year showed a large increase over the previous one. An incidental result of this may be to put the new owners in a good light with the local authorities, for have not their new methods of management increased the profits and therefore increased the amount of income tax payable?

Internal control

Most of the foregoing examples illustrate deficiencies in internal control, but here are some other specific cases which may be mentioned:

(a) all books of account written up by one person in a business which was not exactly small;
(b) bank accounts operated by one signatory only;
(c) wages and salary sheets entirely prepared by one person;
(d) journal entries not authorized and not supported by any documentation;
(e) purchase invoices not checked for prices, receipt of goods or orders;
(f) expense vouchers not authorized;
(g) no procedure for ordering supplies.

From what I have said I hope it is clear that our approach to auditing on the Continent is the same as that adopted in the UK. An examination and evaluation of the system of internal control determines the extent to which the records are subject to detailed testing. Some of the situations to which I have referred may not sound unusual for they are not unknown in Britain. When they are found to exist here the test of transactions is naturally extended; the same applies to our work in Continental countries.

It is the frequency with which one is confronted with off-beat situations, as measured by our professional standards, that makes auditing on the Continent a more lengthy procedure. The time spent on the audit of a company across the Channel may quite necessarily be 25 to 30 per cent more than that needed for a company of similar size operating in the UK. This in turn can produce fee problems unless the client understands the different conditions under which auditing in Europe outside the UK is carried out. It is true, however, that clients in these countries are subject to the same conditions as the auditors and can therefore be expected to be sympathetically inclined towards the problems which have to be faced by the foreign accounting firms.

In the brief paper I have tried to illustrate some of the problems which confront the international accounting firms in their practices on the Continent of Europe. Someone else writing a paper on the same subject could cover an entirely different series of subjects, but the same picture would be given.

An artist once explained to me some of the basic principles of drawing; if these are followed the resulting picture is pleasing, if they are ignored or misapplied you can hear people saying: 'there is something wrong with this picture'. I have always maintained that auditing is an art and not a science, I think that the same can be said of accountancy and book-keeping. If you follow the basic rules of principle the picture will be true and fair – otherwise there can be chaos like the Biblical house built on sand.

I conclude my remarks with two illustrations of chaos which I have come across. On investigating a company for a prospective purchase, we found that the book-keeping principle of double entry had been faithfully followed. It was beautifully simple. Besides the cash-book there were two general ledger accounts: in one were recorded all the purchases of fixed assets; into the other went all other cash payments and all receipts of cash. The difference on the latter account was the profit or loss – book-keeping par excellence, but result – chaos. I must add, though, that the client paid us for resolving this tangle into some accounts which gave a reasonably fair presentation.

On another occasion we were auditing a concern in which a British company held 50 per cent of the equity. The accounting was well done and the accounts presented to us for audit appeared to give a pretty true and fair view. There was, however, included in the creditors a fairly sizeable amount with the legend 'NML' against it. The books were not kept in English, but on inquiry we learnt this was a suspense account of doubtful origin and that the initials stood for 'No Man's Land'.

I am still wondering whether this refers only to the gap between Britain and the Continent known as the English Channel, or whether it is a true and fair description of the huge gap which exists between Anglo/American auditing standards and those existing in some countries in continental Europe!

MANAGEMENT INFORMATION

Computer Vulnerability – a new Business Risk

THE rapid growth in EDP over the past decade has resulted in a rapidly increasing proportion of business records being stored in computer files. How many managers stop to ask how crucial for the continued existence of the business such files may be, and how vulnerable they are to destruction or damage through disaster, accident, sabotage, and plain mis-management?

A comprehensive examination of this problem is made in an article entitled 'Danger Ahead! Safeguard Your Computer' in the recent November/December issue of the Harvard Business Review. As the author, Mr Brandt Allen, observes:

> '. . . more frequently, important corporate data and procedures are being recorded on punched cards, magnetic tapes, and disks. The potential disaster these facts imply is one that the corporation must face; a few have already experienced it as real. . . . What is needed most right now is management's awareness of the problem, an appreciation of the hazards involved, and a determination to prevent severe misfortunes.'

Types of hazard

The hazards to which an EDP system is subject where security is poor can be summed up as follows:

(a) Environmental disaster
This is the most difficult hazard to avoid. Fire, floods, etc., may and do destroy EDP installations, not only from risks originating within the installation, but also those generated externally. The only answer to the problem is an adequate back-up facility which is capable of handling the business requirements. The critical question here is one of adequacy. Back-up facilities are not adequate if they cannot service the volume of data that is needed to maintain the essential functions of the business.

(b) Mechanical failure
The inherent danger is not total machine failure – which would be readily apparent – but a partial failure which escapes detection for some time. The author quotes a case where a fault in a magnetic tape drive was only discovered after it had processed hundreds of reels of tape. Although distorting data at random, its self-checking system was reporting normal functioning.

(c) Operator error
Computer operators are as susceptible to human error as other employees – more so perhaps since in most cases they do not have a lengthy background of experience to fall back upon. Errors may mutilate or destroy files and may damage the equipment itself. This point is illustrated with the case of the firm which, although maintaining its files in triplicate, found just as the third and final copy was being run that in the previous two weeks' runs two-thirds of the data had been lost on the other two files.

(d) Program errors
Program errors can range from minor mistakes quickly corrected to major errors which produce unreconciled data requiring an immense manual effort to unscramble, and which sometimes can never be unscrambled.

(e) Theft and fraud
Two major risks can occur within this category. The risk that an employee in the EDP section might interfere with the program or the machine operation so that it fails to report specific items of data, or secures a payment or some other advantage to himself.

The other is that an outsider may make use of the speed characteristic of the computer to extract or destroy valuable records. Millions of characters can be extracted in a few moments leaving no trace of what has happened. The day of the computer-trained thief may not yet have dawned, but the possibilities are quite frightening. Managements have a clear duty to recognize the possible dangers of this concentration of information about their companies and take every possible precaution against unauthorized access.

Wilful damage by an employee or ex-employee is probably the hazard that is most feared. The author refers to a case where a dissatisfied employee used magnets to destroy nearly every data file and program, and the auditors were doubtful whether they could retrieve sufficient data to enable the company to stay in business.

Developing risks

Problems inherent in these risks are not likely to lessen. In the past, security has been achieved to some extent because the number of people who understood EDP was limited. The increasing use of simple programming languages continually enlarges the field of people who could wrongfully use that knowledge and the extension of data links may mean that the thief need not come within hundreds of miles of the installation.

The trend to real-time systems begins to place a business increasingly at risk and as such systems become even more sophisticated, there will be less written evidence of data and the continued functioning of the computer is vital for business operations to be carried out at all.

The extent of the hazards outlined are partly due to the way in which computer usage has expanded. Expansion has been rapid and the priority for each new application has been to supply the basic information print-out, e.g., pay slips and wages sheet for the payroll application. Only a subsidiary role has been played by the need for control information and its reconciliation with data external to the computer.

A first step in any reappraisal of computer security should be concerned with correcting this imbalance and ensuring that all new programs have sufficient internal and external checks.

Other steps which may be taken include:

(a) Maintance of duplicate files
This elementary precaution is well understood. What is required is adequate supervision to ensure that it is carried out and that its benefits are not vitiated by the storage of duplicate data on the same or contiguous location where both files are exposed to common dangers.

(b) Control of access to EDP installations

Access to installations should be carefully controlled and supervised. Although this may primarily apply to employees, visitors also may require scrutiny. Much of the risk can be avoided if data other than that currently being run is kept securely under lock and key.

The problem is to ensure that procedures laid down for the storage of files and access thereto are adhered to. EDP personnel are not instinctively security conscious, nor are they particularly sensitive to the commercial value of the data that they process. As a result, security procedures tend to be ignored in the interests of speed and convenience.

(c) Internal security group

Because of the general inability of the line manager to control the very specialized work carried out by senior EDP staff, this task should be vested in a group of people possessing the requisite skills. The purpose of the group, who should be completely independent of EDP management, should be to:

(i) design, implement, and monitor control procedures;
(ii) check for failure and sabotage;
(iii) plan emergency back-up facilities;
(iv) test duplicate files and access procedures;
(v) monitor the security system.

Taxation Case

A full report of the case summarized in this column will be published, with Notes on the Judgment, in the 'Annotated Tax Cases'

Pendleton v. Mitchells & Butlers Ltd

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)
December 18th, 1968

(Before Mr Justice Cross)

Income tax – Legal costs – Licensed premises – Redevelopment – Removal of licences – Applications to licensing planning committee – And to licensing justices – Whether legal costs capital or revenue items – Birmingham Corporation Act 1946, section 14 – Licensing Act 1953, sections 53, 54, 56, 57, 58, 59 – Birmingham (Central Re-development) Compulsory Purchase Order 1946.

The respondent company carried on business as a brewer and retailer of beer, and it owned a large number of fully-licensed and off-licensed premises in Birmingham, most of them run by managers. Since the war the company's business had been affected by planning schemes. Birmingham is a licensing planning area within the Licensing Act 1953.

In 1955 the licensing planning committee for Birmingham instituted 'equation of barrelage' in order to provide a fair redistribution of licences and to avoid unnecessary payment of compensation on compulsory acquisition. If a licence went into suspense because the premises were war-damaged or were compulsorily acquired, the total trade of the premises in terms of barrels of beer over a period was calculated. The licence in suspense went into a 'bank', and the barrelage of the old premises was recorded. These licences were taken out of the 'bank' in the order in which they had been put in, so that it was fortuitous which licences would be used again in any locality.

Application for a licence for new premises was almost invariably by way of planning removal under sections 56 and 57 of the Licensing Act 1953 and not by way of new licence under section 58. The barrelage of the proposed new premises was agreed between valuers acting for the company and Birmingham Corporation, and the company agreed to surrender the equivalent barrelage in respect of licences in suspense. The company then applied to the licensing planning committee for a proposal for a planning removal or for a certificate of no objection. If the committee's decision was approved by the Minister, an application had to be made to the justices for a licence. The procedure had to be meticulously followed, and the company incurred legal (and other) expenditure by reason of the applications.

The company was able to extend its business only by the acquisition of subsidiaries or by obtaining licensed premises outside Birmingham, and it was struggling to maintain or replace the barrelage of premises which had been compulsorily acquired or were subject thereto. Licences were being placed in suspense in the bank at a greater rate than the company was able to use them. Eventually the company would have fewer licensed premises with larger trade individually, but collectively no increased barrelage.

It was contended for the company that the expenditure on legal costs was wholly and exclusively for the preservation of the trade and goodwill, and did not bring into existence any capital asset or any asset of an enduring nature; and that the expenditure was on revenue account. The Inland Revenue contended that the expenditure was capital expenditure. The Special Commissioners found that applications fell into three groups of removals: (i) removals from premises where the trade was poor, or to premises which were upgraded, (ii) removals to assist the company to preserve its existing but threatened trade, (iii) removals outside Birmingham to increase trade through new houses. The Special Commissioners decided that the expenditure on (i) and (iii) was capital expenditure, but that that at (ii) was on revenue account.

Held: the expenditure under all three heads was capital expenditure.

Close Companies and Shortfall

The following memorandum, issued jointly by the Association of British Chambers of Commerce and the Confederation of British Industry, has been prepared in the light of recent discussions between the two bodies and the Inland Revenue on the problems of close companies. The memorandum is being circulated to Inspectors of Taxes by the Revenue as an indication of the views of the ABCC and the CBI on this topic.

THE shortfall legislation introduced by the Finance Act 1965 became effective from April 5th, 1966, and it is only now becoming possible to review how it is working in practice. There is no doubt that the threat of shortfall assessment which overhangs close companies has caused a great deal of anxiety, especially for the directors of trading companies and their advisers. This memorandum is particularly concerned with trading companies.

2. The principle of the shortfall legislation is not a novelty. Its predecessor, under which a company could be assessed to surtax on its profits if its dividend distributions were unreasonably low, had been in force since 1922. There are, however, two important differences between the old and the new procedures. Under the old procedure the burden of proof was entirely on the Inland Revenue to show that a trading company had not distributed a reasonable proportion of its income. Under the new procedure, it is for the taxpayer to prove that a company could not afford to pay (within certain limits) a larger dividend than it in fact proposes without prejudice to its business requirements.

3. There is also a purely administrative difference. The old system was centrally administered by the Surtax Office, in which a relatively small number of officials were able to accumulate great experience in the handling of this difficult work. The new system is administered by District Inspectors in over 700 different districts.

4. The object of this legislation is to prevent the avoidance of personal taxation that can arise through the agency of a closely controlled company which retains profits in excess of its business requirements. Prior to the 1965 legislation, such retentions could benefit only surtax payers. Under the new system income tax can also be saved by this means but it should be borne in mind that all companies pay corporation tax which is higher than income tax and is not payable by unincorporated traders. There is, therefore, no incentive to use a corporate enterprise to save income tax but, on the contrary, the taxation advantages may well lie with the unincorporated trader except when the proprietors are, or expect to become, surtax payers.

5. The declared intention of the corporation tax introduced in 1965 was to encourage the ploughing back of profits for use in the development of a business. It would, therefore, be illogical if close companies, which account for about a quarter of the country's gross national product, were compelled to distribute amounts which ought to be retained to finance the maintenance and development of the business. A close company is, of course, far more dependent on self-financing than a public company, and therefore prudent directors adopt a conservative dividend policy. If profits of say 15 to 20 per cent were earned on capital employed and no dividend at all were paid, companies would be left, after payment of corporation tax, with an annual retention in the region of 9 to 12 per cent on capital employed, which is none too much for an actively expanding business that does not have access to the capital markets. However, the Finance Act 1965 provides for a maximum distribution of 60 per cent in the case of trading income. Such a dividend, after paying corporation tax, will on the above figures leave only 4 or 5 per cent on capital employed as available for reserves. This is barely enough to maintain the existing business in times of inflation and leaves virtually nothing to finance expansion.

6. There is, therefore, a strong presumption that the great majority of trading companies should be able to adopt the dividend policy suited to their particular needs. It is only those companies which have accumulated cash and liquid resources in excess of their requirements, or those which have used income to repay initial business loans, whose distribution policy can be called in question.

7. While it has been indicated above that the companies with large cash and liquid resources must expect their accounts to be critically examined, it does not follow that higher dividends can necessarily be paid. The onus of proof is, however, then placed upon the company to explain the need for this accumulation of cash and the purpose for which it will ultimately be required.

8. It will be necessary to make some comparison between the future maintenance and development expenditure on the one hand and resources available to meet it on the other. This comparison is not a mere exercise in arithmetic; it must lack precision because it involves forecasting and, in the end, the result is a matter of judgement. As to the elements of the comparison that is required, maintenance and development expenditure is a wide concept. The company's expenditure plans must be genuine but cannot be precise. A company may intend to build new business premises if it can find land in an appropriate location and obtain planning permission. In such circumstances there is no absolute certainty that the premises can be built within a specified period of time but this would not necessarily invalidate the company's claim to retain funds for this purpose. Again, a company may wish to develop its business by acquiring another business in the same or a related field; provided that the company can show that its intention is genuine and capable of fulfilment it can retain moneys to do this.

9. As to the resources which are available to meet any proposed expenditure, it is clear that funds which are invested in fixed assets or current assets of the nature of stock or book debts cannot, in most circumstances, be regarded as available for this purpose. So long as the business continues, these assets will not be turned into cash except in unusual circumstances, e.g., where at a particular date either book debts or stock were at an exceptionally high level on account of some special or non-recurring factor. It would, however, only be a very exceptional case in which it could be suggested that a particular level of stock or book debts was not a requirement of the company's business. In a normal case, therefore, the resources which are available, either for the payment of dividends or for future development expenditure, which need to be taken into account in the assessment of a reasonable distribution, are only the liquid assets, i.e., cash or near-cash, such as investments.

10. If a company has no cash or investments, and finances its trading operations by the use of borrowed money such as overdrafts, and this situation is likely to continue, there would seem to be little ground for any shortfall assessment in the normal case.

Reviews

Dix on Contracts of Employment

Third edition by Judge DOROTHY KNIGHT WADDY, Q.C.

Butterworths, 58*s*.

This book is sub-titled 'With special reference to the Redundancy Payments and Contracts of Employment Acts'; in fact, it includes the full text of both Acts, with commentary, together with a 100-page appendix of various forms and precedents; so that the treatment of the underlying common law is disappointingly meagre. In present circumstances, many employers doubtless consider it less trouble to offer a dismissed employee something more than his legal due than to risk litigation no matter how righteous. But even allowing for a dearth of recent precedent, Foxall v. International Land Credit Co, decided in 1867, seems of rather dubious value today as an example of custom judicially noticed.

In the present edition opportunity has been taken to include for the first time, notes of a number of decisions by Industrial Tribunals under the Redundancy Payments Act. These decisions are reported and, although not technically binding, are regarded as the highest persuasive authority. Thus, company secretaries, office managers and others will find it helpful to have examples conveniently to hand of the circumstances which do, or do not, constitute 'redundancy', or misconduct, or unreasonable refusal of alternative employment. Of particular interest to accountants is Mackenzie v. William Paton Ltd ([1966] ITR 507); an unqualified cost accountant who was replaced by a qualified man because his employers doubted his ability to install and run a new system was held not to be entitled to a redundancy payment.

We have come a long way in Governmental supervision of the individual since the days of laissez-faire, and the 'new common law' which is being evolved by the Industrial Tribunals has created a gap in legal literature which the author's treatment of her material does not entirely fill. Legal practitioners and others who bear the burden of making the law work will doubtless find room for the new Dix upon their shelves, but it is manifestly not addressed to those seeking a first acquaintance with the subject.

The Hospitals Year Book 1969

Editor: N. W. CHAPLIN, M.A.

The Institute of Hospital Administrators. London. 122*s* 6*d*.

This valuable work of reference manifests careful planning to maintain the standard of previous editions in providing up-to-date and authoritative information for all branches of administration and management in the hospital and allied services.

The hospital directory sections give full particulars of hospitals and hospital authorities in Great Britain, Northern Ireland, and the Isle of Man. Other sections include details of hospital finance, government departments and statutory bodies, organizations concerned with hospital and health services, local health authorities, executive councils, the NHS Whitley Councils and hospital contributory and provident schemes. The substantial reference section includes notes for hospital administrators on legal, technical and general subjects, as well as detailed indexes to statutory instruments and official circulars, summaries or reports, and a short bibliography of hospital literature. As in previous years, the final section consists of a comprehensive directory of hospital suppliers.

Scottish Institute's Area Meetings

WE are indebted to the Editor-in-Chief of The Accountant's Magazine for permission to reproduce from his February issue this report on the local meetings of members of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland held in the United Kingdom last autumn. Each of the fifteen meetings held was conducted by the President, Mr John A. Stewart, C.A., supported on the platform by the Vice-President and one or two other members of Council or of the Future of the Profession Committee.

The following is a summary of the more important points raised – many of which will have been common to the meetings of the English and Irish Institutes, and some to those of the other participating bodies. In each case the point raised is recorded in roman type and the reply from the platform follows in italics.

(1) Integration

(a) Criticism of general concept

It was suggested that integration would bring no benefit either to the Scottish Institute or to its individual members: on the contrary it would entail distinct disadvantages.

The basic objective of the integration proposals is the strengthening and unifying of the accountancy profession. The scheme starts from the premise that the profession is one, embracing all fields of accountancy, covering members of the profession in public practice, in industry and commerce, and in the public service. At the present time the six participating bodies have different entry qualifications, different training methods and different examination requirements. To have three enlarged Chartered Institutes with uniformly high entry qualifications, similar training arrangements and similar examination standards would unquestionably produce in the long run a stronger and more cohesive profession, a situation which, by enhancing the standing of the profession as a whole, could bring nothing but benefit to the Scottish Institute and its members.

If the Scottish Institute, as its members claim, occupies a leading position in the profession, not only in the United Kingdom but in the world, it should accept its corresponding obligation to further the interests of the profession as a whole and not lose the opportunity of having its high standards adopted as the universal norm.

The most commonly advanced grounds for criticism of the general concept were as follows:

(i) The educational and examination standards of the ACCA (The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants) and ICWA (The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants) were thought to be lower than those of the Scottish Institute.

It is accepted that the minimum entry standard required by the ACCA and ICWA is lower than that of the Scottish Institute, although both bodies now register a substantial number of graduates as students. No meaningful comparison is possible between the respective examinations of the three bodies, but it is fair to say that both the ACCA and ICWA have raised standards within the last few years. In any case, it is not the past, or even the present, situation which is important; it is the fact that integration will eventually produce comparable high standards throughout the profession as a whole.

(ii) In comparison with the broadly-based training and experience of CAs, the training and experience of members of the ICWA and IMTA (The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants) was narrow and specialized. There was an obvious need for such specialists in industry and the public service but it would be pointless, and confusing, to call them 'Chartered Accountants'.

The training of existing members of the ICWA and IMTA has been specialized up to date. That specialization has been designed to equip them for the duties they perform. Post-integration students in the industrial and commercial stream and in the public service stream will be specialists with a broader basic training. This is desirable from all points of view. To engage in public practice they will have to have served for 30 months in the office of a practising accountant and should thus be comparable with the man trained in public practice.

(iii) Integration of members of the ACCA, ICWA and IMTA into the Scottish Institute would result in a 'dilution' of the CA qualification and such dilution would continue for a great many years. During that period the Scottish Institute would lose the very high reputation which its members had built up over the years.

Although it must be accepted that integration would result in some 'dilution', in that there would be 'CAs' with different training and qualification background, it is difficult to see what adverse effect this so-called 'dilution' would have. The position as it affects public practice is safeguarded by the 30 months' rule and, as stated below, the position of 'integrated' CAs in industry and the public service would remain exactly the same as it was before integration. The Scottish Institute would be much more likely to suffer a loss in reputation and standing by refusing to accept integration than by participating in it, since such an attitude could only be construed as reactionary and isolationist. It would, admittedly, be many years before the effects of integration resulting from the admission of existing members of the ACCA, ICWA and IMTA worked themselves out, but the long-term benefits of integration greatly outweigh any short-term and problematical, disadvantages.

(iv) Integration would adversely affect members in industry and younger members in particular. The status of CAs in industry would be lowered by their being placed on a par with AACCAs and ACWAs. Younger members, who had not yet established themselves, would face competition from 'CAs' who had not qualified as such; it would be unfair to ask them to face such competition when they had, by hard work and application, gained a more difficult qualification.

It cannot be accepted that the status of existing CAs in industry would be affected in any way by integration. Nor can it be accepted that increased competition met by CAs seeking positions or promotion in industry, commerce or the public service is a valid criticism. Employers do not engage or promote simply on the basis of a designation: they judge on the basis of education, qualification, experience and ability.

(v) There was no need for integration: the Scottish Institute was perfectly capable of looking after itself.

There is every need for integration. The profession in the United Kingdom is divided and irrationally organized. As a result it cannot exert its influence in a manner in which, with its special knowledge of and concern for the financial situation of this country, it has both a right and a duty to do. The proliferation of accountancy bodies means duplication of effort and expense, competition in the matter of recruitment and variations in accountancy standards. Integration would not only enable the profession to speak with one voice when occasion demands but would also raise the standard and reputation of the whole profession.

If the Scottish Institute stands aside from integration its members must face the possible consequences. Apart from the possibility of some re-grouping by some or all of the other participating bodies there is the certainty that the Scottish Institute's attitude would lose it a lot of friends both at home and overseas and its reputation as a dynamic, forward-looking body would unquestionably suffer.

(b) Alternative proposals

Some members who did not agree with the point made at (a) (v) above nevertheless considered that some other form of integration would be preferable to that proposed in the scheme. The suggested alternatives were the following:

(i) Integration of the three Chartered Institutes.

The integration proposals were designed to cater for the whole of the accountancy profession in all the three 'streams', of public practice, of industry and commerce, and of public service. An amalgamation of the three Chartered Institutes alone could not have contributed materially towards the aims of the integration proposals. Moreover, in the case of the Irish Institute, such an amalgamation would have been impracticable for constitutional reasons and, in the case of the Scottish Institute, there are other cogent reasons against such a course.

The Council of the Scottish Institute considered this question most carefully during the course of the negotiations and took the view that the integration proposals were correct in not including any proposal for an amalgamation of the Scottish and English Institutes; the reasons for this view were partly those set out in (iii) below and partly that such an amalgamation to the exclusion of the other four bodies would have driven a wedge down the centre of the profession cutting off those trained in public practice from those trained in other 'streams'.

(ii) A federal structure in which the six participating bodies remained basically independent but were linked by a system of joint committees and, possibly, a supreme Council.

A federal structure of six bodies with their existing differences in background, standards, objectives and aspirations would, it is thought, be unlikely to be a practical proposition and therefore unlikely to be able to mobilize effectively the resources and collate the views of the accountancy profession in the United Kingdom. The existence of three enlarged Institutes of Chartered Accountants, each having broadly a similar approach to the profession's problems, is considered likely to lead to a practical and effective collaboration in dealing with these problems.

(iii) One single Institute for the whole United Kingdom, embracing all six participating bodies.

As already explained a single Institute could not include the Irish Institute: there could however be a single Institute for the United Kingdom. It is difficult to see what benefits such a structure would confer beyond, possibly, certain economies; on the other hand, it would have positive disadvantages. The Scottish Institute has an important and special role to play in the community in Scotland. Quite apart from traditional and historical differences, Scotland has its own legal system, its own educational system and a different basis for its economy, and over the years the Scottish Institute has built up a close relationship with other Scottish institutions, in particular the Scottish Universities. The continuance of separate Institutes for the three countries is not intended in any way to hamper the three bodies from speaking with a common voice on all appropriate occasions through the development of the proposed system of joint committees, the potential value of which has become apparent from joint activities over the past year or two and from the integration discussions.

(2) Dual and triple membership

Some opposition was expressed to the proposals for dual and triple membership on the grounds that if sufficient members of the English Institute took out dual membership of the Scottish Institute they could form a majority and assume control.

Several members in England pointed out that, either without payment or at very low cost, they already enjoyed the reciprocal facilities at local organization level promised by paragraph 4 of the scheme: to that extent integration would confer no extra benefit. It was suggested that members of the Scottish Institute working in England should be able to relate themselves in some way more closely with the English Institute without having to take out dual membership and pay a second subscription: the exact nature of the suggested relationship was not developed.

Theoretically dual members could form a majority within the Scottish Institute but this eventuality is considered so unlikely as not to warrant serious consideration.

The grant of dual (or triple) membership is intended as a liberal gesture to members of one Chartered Institute working in the country of another. Coupled with the provisions for reciprocal facilities at local level this concession should be of value to members of the Scottish Institute working in England, Wales or Ireland and it is difficult to see what further concessions could be made in this direction.

(3) Creation of a second tier

The name 'Licentiate Accountant' and particularly the designation 'Lic.A' were widely criticized.

The fact that the English Institute proposed to give its licentiate accountants practice rights, albeit restricted, and that licentiate accountants of the English Institute would be free to practise in Scotland, as well as in England and Wales, received some criticism.

There was little opposition to the general concept of a second tier. The main argument was that, without practice rights, the licentiate qualification would hold no attractions, and the lack of voting rights would make licentiate accountants into 'second-class citizens'.

It is accepted that the name 'licentiate accountant' and the designation 'Lic.A' are unsatisfactory and it is hoped to produce better alternatives.

The Scottish Institute regards the proposed category of licentiate accountants as technician-employees, while the English Institute sees them as technicians who, if in public practice with restricted practising rights, would help to meet the competition experienced in England from unqualified accountants. Because of this difference in approach the period of experience required before qualifying as a licentiate accountant of the Scottish Institute is four years, whereas for the English Institute it is five.

It is not considered that CAs in practice in Scotland need have any fears of competition from English licentiate accountants with restricted practice rights.

The success of the licentiate accountant qualification in practising offices will depend upon the practising firms themselves. It will be up to them to make a career as a licentiate accountant an attractive proposition. In view of the possibility of some reduction in the number of CA students in practising offices due to the raising of the entry standard, greater numbers of graduates and the provisions for training in other streams, some restructuring of staffing arrangements in practising offices will be necessary, and licentiate accountants should meet a real need in this connection.

Within the Institute the interests of licentiate accountant members would be adequately looked after by the licentiate accountants committee and it would not be appropriate that they should be given voting rights pari passu with CA members.

(4) Training and examinations

The proposal to allow training of CA students in all three streams, particularly the industrial stream, was questioned, the main grounds (some of which are conflicting) being these:

(a) The traditional method of training in a practising office unquestionably proved itself to be the best means of imparting the broad general knowledge and experience required by a chartered accountant and inculcating principles of integrity and objectivity which were the basis of professional ethics.

It is accepted that good training in a practising office would probably remain the best training available for CA students, but this does not mean that a perfectly adequate training cannot be given in industry or the public service. Since the examination syllabuses in the three streams are virtually the same for the first three parts and contain several common papers in Parts IV and V, CA students in all three streams will share a very considerable body of common knowledge. The training in all three streams will be closely supervised and controlled by the Council of the Institute.

(b) Industrial and commercial companies simply could not provide training of similar scope; the student, for example, would probably be seeing only one set of accounts and one accounting system.

Since so many companies nowadays belong to groups it is probable that the student will be seeing more than one set of accounts and perhaps more than one accounting system. In any case, however, before permitting training in any industrial or commercial company the Council will ensure that the company concerned can provide training of the scope and depth required. Training in industry will be supplemented by tutorial classes at which CA students from all streams will meet to study common subjects.

(c) Moreover, industry and commerce would wish to turn out 'company men' and, as generations of students were trained in industry and then themselves trained other students, there would be a real danger of the loss of that objectivity for which Scottish chartered accountants were known and respected.

The provisions made for the control and supervision of education and training in industry by the Council should be adequate to ensure that CA students in industry will, after qualifying, maintain fully the traditional standards.

(d) CAs in industry, commerce and the public service would have insufficient time at their disposal to train CA students.

Discussions with the Confederation of British Industry and representatives of local government, public service boards and nationalized industries have shown that these bodies welcome the proposal to allow training of CA students in industry and the public service and it is unlikely that difficulties will be placed in the way of CAs in industry and the public service who have the authority of the Council of the Institute to train students.

(e) Training in industry was contrary to the recommendation of the Institute's Special Committee on Education and Training (the Dewar Committee).

The Institute's Special Committee on Education and Training was not considering training in industry in the context of integration. It only considered the possibility of secondment to industry in the context of the existing pattern of the profession: the integration proposals raised quite new considerations. This was recognized by a Council resolution at the time when it considered the Committee's report and, in reference to the discussions regarding the integration proposals, recorded, 'that a successful conclusion to these discussions will necessitate further consideration of the problems of education and training which will arise in the new circumstances'.

(f) Because of the higher rewards which industry could pay to trainees, practising offices would be deprived of CA students and so, eventually, of qualified staff.

There is clearly some misapprehension about the scale on which training in industry will be possible. Certainly until the scheme is fully launched the opportunities for training in industry will be limited, since it will be necessary for the Council of the Institute to consider every training application separately. Even when the scheme is in full operation the number of companies with sufficient facilities to provide the quality of training required may not be as great as members seem to think.

Moreover, it is expected that many entrants to the profession, whether graduates or school-leavers, will recognize the value of training in a practising office even if their ultimate intention is to make their career in another stream.

Nevertheless, practising firms will undoubtedly have to review the remuneration, conditions of service, quality of training and prospects which they offer to CA students if they are to attract an adequate number of recruits of the right quality.

As previously stated, they may also have to restructure the staffing arrangements of their offices, thereby creating positions which can be filled by licentiate accountants.

On the general question of training in industry the platform party also made the following important point:

Training in industry already exists in the ACCA and ICWA and, in addition, many large companies are training their own financial staff. If the proposal to allow training in industry of CA students after integration were abandoned, industry would inevitably expand its own training schemes for financial staff. Surely it is preferable that the enlarged Chartered Institutes should have as much control as possible over the training of accountants in and for industry? In this they will have the backing of the Industrial Training Boards, who will be eager to see that their grants are used to produce accountants of the highest calibre.

(5) Public practice

The proposals in the scheme regarding practice rights were questioned, mainly on the following points:

(a) Although it was appreciated that every person who was a member of the Scottish Institute at the time of integration, and every person who was a CA apprentice at that time and subsequently qualified, would be entitled to the automatic issue of an unrestricted practising certificate (required if he wished to practise in the United Kingdom), it was contended that the fact that such a person would have to apply and pay a fee for such a certificate was an infringement of his existing rights.

A system of practising certificates will be required for the protection of the public when the membership of the Institute includes chartered accountants who have not been trained in a practising office: the two types of practising certificates will distinguish between those able to perform the 'reserved functions' and those not so entitled. Although the rights which are possessed by both members and students at the time of integration to engage in unrestricted practice will be preserved, it would be invidious and confusing if they were allowed to do this without obtaining practising certificates, whilst other members were required to hold such certificates.

The fee is required to pay for the administration of the practising certificate system.

It cannot be too strongly emphasized that existing CAs and pre-integration CA apprentices who qualify subsequently will immediately and automatically be entitled, on application and payment of the fee, to the issue of an unrestricted practising certificate. This applies even if they have never been in practice since they qualified as CAs.

(b) It was argued that it was unnecessary to require a post-integration CA to acquire two years' approved practical experience before being entitled to a practising certificate.

The justification for the 'two year' rule is that it gives the CA who intends to practise a period within which to mature further and, if he is ambitious, to seek further experience, for example outside the practising stream in which he trained. It is felt that with the complexities of today's legislation and the enormous body of knowledge which a good practising CA must acquire it would be undesirable to allow future CAs to offer their services to the public immediately upon qualification. In special cases, where hardship might result from the application of this rule, the Council will have power to modify or waive it.

(c) It was suggested that 30 months' experience in a practising CA's office was insufficient to fit a person trained in industry or the public service to exercise unrestricted practice rights.

It must be borne in mind that a CA who has been trained in industry, whether he became a CA as a result of integration or entered the profession after integration, will be a trained and qualified accountant: what he will lack is experience of public practice. At the present time an accountancy graduate who enters the profession is only required to complete a three-year apprenticeship and it is considered that two and a half years' experience in a practising office will be perfectly adequate to fit an industrially trained CA to practise himself.

(6) Local organization of the Institute

These proposals appeared to have general support.

No comment.

(7) Central organization of the Institute

(a) An objection was raised by members in the nationalized industries to their inclusion in the 'public sector' stream (paragraph 43 of the scheme), on the grounds that their interests were more closely allied with those of the industrial stream.

This point will be considered.

(b) Another suggestion was that the new constitution of the Council for which the scheme provides could give dominance to the non-practising members.

While it is true that the proposals will give representatives from the industry and commerce and public service 'streams' a minimum of 50 per cent of the Council membership, the independence and well-being of the practitioner is certain to be a matter of vital concern to all members of the Council whatever their occupation. Under these circumstances, it is not considered likely that the practitioner's position will be prejudiced as a result of the possibility of there being a majority of non-practising members on the Council. The total membership of the Institute for some years has contained a majority of non-practising members and this has not given rise to any problem. In addition, cross-fertilization of ideas will occur as a result of the 'stream' committees of the Council and from the fact that discussions of the viewpoints of each of the 'streams' will be carried out in the functional committees reporting to the Council. This should ensure that the Council is fully aware of the standpoints of all concerned.

(8) Financial matters

Few comments were made on the proposals set out in Part VI and Appendix G of the scheme, but those which were made were strongly put. The chief points criticized were the following:

(a) The proposal to have uniform subscriptions across all three streams.

In the past there has been a tendency to refer to the 'profession' as if that term embraced only accountants in public practice, but the integration proposals start from the premise that the accountancy profession embraces all branches of accountancy and they provide for parity of treatment and representation of members of the Institute from all three streams. As a corollary it is only right that all members should pay the same basic rate of subscription.

(b) The rates of subscription proposed and, in particular, the increase to non-practising members which these rates would entail.

The rates of subscription proposed are purposely the same as those proposed by the English Institute for the first full year of integration: it is clearly undesirable that there should be any question of members of the ACCA, ICWA and IMTA deciding which Chartered Institute to join on the basis of the level of subscription they would have to pay.

Moreover, subscriptions of the level proposed will in any case be required to meet the Institute's recurrent commitments. These include the provision of many services for members, the development of a more extensive committee system by which as many members as possible are involved in the Institute's activities, and the maintenance of the Institute's position in the international accountancy scene in general, and in the European scene in particular.

(c) The charging of an annual fee for a practising certificate.

As previously stated, the fee to be charged for practising certificates is required to meet the cost of administering the certificate system.

(9) Other accountancy bodies

The great majority of members who attended the area meetings were clearly opposed to the extension of the integration proposals to any accountancy body other than the ACCA, ICWA and IMTA.

It is clear that opinion, as expressed at these area meetings of the Scottish Institute, is against the extension of the integration scheme to other accountancy bodies. It is confirmed that approval of the integration scheme itself would in no way be interpreted as approval of such an extension.

Finance and Commerce

Shareholder ties

THERE is a strong element of close shareholder-relationship in the Mann Egerton car distributing group, from whose 1968 published report and accounts this week's reprint is taken. With the report, shareholders received a letter from the chairman, Mr R. W. B. Hawksley, T.D., pointing out that surely it makes 'a lot of sense' for shareholders to support the company in which they have an investment.

Shareholders were given a reply-paid postcard to send to the company if they were contemplating buying a new or used car or commercial vehicle, or if they have 'relations or friends who might be interested'. This, Mr Hawksley states, was not the first time he had approached shareholders. He has done so for several years and 'so far several hundred extra cars have been sold as a result'.

Car distribution is the group's main business and the directors' report gives the turnover and profit breakdown as shown in the table below.

'Electrical' covers Mann Egerton (Electrical) which is in industrial electrical contracting, and 'Manufacturers' covers Mann Egerton (Manufacturers) in contract woodworking.

Fire

Early in the year under review – on the night of October 31st, 1967, to be precise – a large section of the head office accounts department in Norwich was gutted by fire and this, plus rebuilding and making good, caused a major interruption of work. The chairman pays tribute to the secretary, Mr R. W. Douglass, F.C.A., and his staff 'for the magnificent way they responded and dealt with the crisis, which otherwise might have caused a major setback'.

Mr Douglass and his staff are also coping with a computer (ICL 1902A) installed last September and operational shortly after. 'It will progressively take on more stock control, accountancy and other tasks' the chairman comments, 'but it will be some time yet before it can be put to sufficient use to cease being a substantial extra expense item and become a profitable investment'.

There is potentially a bigger work load for the computer now that Mann Egerton have taken over H. A. Saunders Ltd, one of the biggest Austin distributors in the country. This acquisition, Mr Hawksley says, 'represents by far the largest expansion of the company's undertaking in its history and gives it a large number of additional outlets, in London, the Home Counties, the West Country and the Midlands'. The profit contribution, however, will not be significant this year.

Précis

The last two pages of the Mann Egerton report provide a full list of branch locations (including those of H. A. Saunders), complete with addresses and telephone numbers, as well as brief descriptions – 'Petrol filling station and car sales', 'Car and commercial vehicle sales and service', 'Tractor and agricultural sales and service', and so on.

The layout of the accounts is plain and clear. The ten-year record is a précis of profit and loss account and balance sheet figures rather than a summary of additional information of, e.g., return on turnover, return on capital employed and so on, in which direction the reporting could be improved.

Car distribution is an industry subject to the whims of Chancellors of the Exchequer and to government ideas of economic control. The year covered by the accounts included the rush to buy which followed devaluation, and which preceded what was expected to be a 'tough' Budget. But even after the March 1968 Budget, demand continued to be good and it was not until the late summer and early autumn that sales began to slow down.

The supply of new cars, however, was erratic and inadequate – mainly because of strikes. Otherwise profits – which in any event were a good deal better than the board anticipated – would have been better still. The more stable side of the business – repairs, service and the sale of parts, plus a considerable stake in commercial vehicles – made a major contribution to profits.

Costs

The cost of SET increased by £28,857 to £183,190 but this includes only one month at the 50 per cent higher rate. That rate will be a particular burden during the current year when sales are likely to be down on last year. Mr Hawksley reports that in October and November, profits were slightly down on the previous year but in December they were more markedly so, arising from poor trade – particularly in used cars – and the long Christmas holiday. Trade has since picked up but supplies of cars are erratic and it is difficult to test the market.

Forecasting in this trade is virtually impossible, although the chairman makes the point concerning the latest increase in petrol duty and further hire-purchase restrictions, that 'motorists now tend to offset these continuous impositions by economies in other cost-of-living items'.

CITY NOTES

FOR most of last year the equity sector of the stock-market was a place where too much money chased too few shares. The change in share supply began in the second half of last year.

This year the share supply has increased further through still more rights issues and new share offers and the money supply has been syphoned off by the need of bank customers to sell securities to reduce overdrafts. The strength of that combination, and more particularly the money part of it, was the main reason for a 50 points fall in The Financial Times share index in the space of three weeks.

A technical rally after such a shake-out was generally expected but if the money supply is going to stay tight – and there is every expectation and indication that it will – then any rally will remain technical. Selling has a snowballing effect on the stock-market.

The fact of falling prices is a prime mover towards profit-taking and in recent weeks profit-taking has not only been seen directly in shares but indirectly, so far as the public is concerned, through sales of unit trust holdings. Trusts which cashed in on 1968 growth records may by now have lost some of their investment goodwill.

That annual New Year buying exercise also looks decidedly sick now. The 'shares to follow for the New Year' are now well and truly marked down for the spring sales.

RARELY has there been such an odd take-over situation as the General Foods-Rowntree affair. General Foods as long ago as January 10th, announced their intention of bidding £6 for Rowntree ordinary shares. Belatedly the Rowntree board acknowledged the existence of this intended bid but did nothing more than verbally reject it.

General Foods thereupon indicated that they would be prepared to offer more if the Rowntree board could give them something to go on. Rowntree after due cogitation circulated a letter to their shareholders indicating future growth in earnings and the usual anti-take-over dividend rise.

Three trusts, which between them hold some 56 per cent of Rowntree's equity, immediately came out against the bid. Thereupon there was three weeks' silence from both sides until General Foods said they were still studying 'in depth' the Rowntree statement, but were perturbed that the three trusts seemed to be against a bid of any kind at any price let alone a General Foods' bid of £6 a share.

The only positive move – and even that is a negative one – is that the Board of Trade does not intend to put the General Foods-Rowntree deal before the Monopolies Commission. Meanwhile minority shareholders (considerably changed since many of the originals have had the sense to sell out at stock-market prices ranging up to £6 10*s* a share), are in the peculiar situation of having this intermittent fire of battle over their heads without direct bombardment in the shape of a formal bid. At the time of writing General Foods have still only indicated a bid intention.

ACCORDING to current opinion on the proposed new City Take-over Panel, the City does not expect the Code to be revised so much as the Code's administration and enforcement. The former Code was shortlived because, for it to work, there had to be recognition of its 'spirit' rather than its letter.

In a City where the biggest conglomerate is the tangle of controls of one kind and another, 'spirit' is not what it was in kindlier days. The Code's administration was therefore a step behind the Code's highly sophisticated users.

However, with the proposed appointment of Lord Shawcross as chairman of the Panel, and Mr Ian Fraser, of S. G. Warburg, as chief executive, it is intended that there will be professional administration to match professional use. Also, the administration appears likely to have, in the American idiom, 'enforcement capability'.

Companies: Rights of Preference Shareholders

S LTD had an issued and paid-up capital of £12,500, comprising 20,000 preferred shares of 10*s* each and 50,000 ordinary shares of 1*s* each. A clause in the company's articles provided that (after certain provisions for the redemption of debentures):

> 'the net profits of the company which the directors shall determine to distribute in any year shall be applied, first, in payment of a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent per annum on the amounts paid up or credited as paid up on the preferred shares for the time being issued; secondly, in payment among the holders of the ordinary shares for the time being issued of a sum equivalent to the total sum paid by way of dividend to the holders of the preferred shares; and thirdly, the balance of profits shall be divided as to 50 per cent among the holders of the preferred shares and 50 per cent among the holders of the ordinary shares for the time being issued.'

The company was prosperous, regularly distributing substantial dividends, and at the material time had an undistributed balance of some £325,000 to the credit of its profit and loss account. On a petition to the Court to reduce the company's capital by the repayment of the preferred shares at a premium of 5*s* per share, or 50 per cent, the holders of certain preferred shares contended that the reduction of capital would operate as an abrogation of the rights of that class of members, and that on a true construction of the relevant article (quoted above) the preferred shareholders were entitled to 50 per cent of the undistributed profits, equivalent to 1,625 per cent on the nominal value of their shares.

The Court found that the proposed reduction was neither discriminatory nor unfair, holding that neither the provisions in the company's own articles, nor section 72 of the Companies Act 1948, as affecting the variation or abrogation of class rights were applicable to a cancellation of shares in consequence of the reduction of capital. On the authority of Re Chatterley-Whitfield Collieries Ltd ([1948] 2 All E.R. 593), the right and liability of preference shareholders to prior repayment on a reduction corresponded to their right of prior return of capital in a winding-up. Moreover, the true construction of the relevant article gave the preferred shareholders an interest only in those profits which the directors determined to distribute.

Companies: Disclosure of Evidence given before Inspectors

FOLLOWING the refusal by five persons, who had given evidence before Inspectors appointed by the Board of Trade to investigate the affairs of R Ltd, to consent to disclosure of transcripts thereof to the liquidator of the company, the liquidator sought an order under section 268 of the Companies Act 1948 against the principal examiner of the Companies Inspection Branch. This section, so far as presently relevant, reads as follows:

> '(1) The Court may, at any time after the appointment of a provisional liquidator or the making of a winding-up order, summon before it . . . any person whom the Court deems capable of giving information concerning the promotion, formation, trade, dealings, affairs or property of the company . . .
> '(3) The Court may require him to produce any books or papers in his custody or power relating to the company. . . .'

The liquidator's application came in the first instance before the registrar of the Court, who refused it on the ground that the liquidator would otherwise be put in a stronger position than any other litigant. On appeal from this ruling, the Court held that the registrar had misdirected himself in the exercise of his discretion. The purpose of section 268 was to enable the Court to discover the truth about a company's affairs, and the Court should normally seek to assist a liquidator to discharge his functions as effectively and expeditiously as possible. In the present case, access to the transcripts would enable the liquidator to frame his proceedings better than he otherwise could, and the Court would make an order accordingly.

(Section 50 of the Companies Act 1967, relating to the admissibility in other proceedings of evidence given, inter alia, before Inspectors, is also relevant.)

Banking: trust created. The House of Lords has affirmed unanimously the decision of the Court of Appeal in Quistclose Investments Ltd v. Rolls Razor Ltd and Others, reported on page 817 of The Accountant, June 15th, 1968 (sub nom. Barclays Bank v. Quistclose Investments [1968] 3 W.L.R. 1097: [1968] 3 All E.R. 651).

Companies: restoration of name to register. The Court will not exercise its discretion to restore a name to the register under section 352 of the Companies Act 1948, if the purpose of the application is to bring a claim that can be pursued in another way without restoration; as, e.g., against the liquidator personally. (Re Aldersgate Investments [1968] 112 S.J. 962.)

Companies: unlawful act of special manager. A liquidator who adopts part of a transaction entered into by special managers (under section 263 of the Companies Act 1948) in excess of their powers may be held to have ratified the whole of it. (Re Mawcon [1968] 112 S.J. 1004.)

Companies: powers of directors. A winding-up order operates to terminate the directors' powers, in favour of the Official Receiver. The company thereafter has no power to instruct solicitors or counsel, and a solicitor instructing counsel to apply for a stay of a winding-up order may be personally liable for the costs incurred. Correspondence

Integration of the Profession

SIR, – In answer to Mr Bourn's letter in The Accountant of February 15th concerning the Association of Chartered Accountant Students' Societies' student poll, we would like to make the following observations:

(1) It is incorrect to say that 'the proposals on education and training and those on licentiate accountants depend neither on amalgamation being accepted, nor on each other'. On the contrary, they are the very reason for the amalgamation, viz.

(a) By raising entry standards to 'A' level entrants only, the numbers of recruits will fall, and yet there will still remain a need for personnel to carry out the more routine of the profession's work – hence the need for licentiate accountants.

This second-tier 'chartered accountant' would be impossible without amalgamation, for what 'O' level entrant would become a second-tier 'chartered accountant' when he could become a first-tier certified or cost and works accountant? Without amalgamation with the other accountancy bodies, a second-tier chartered qualification would never draw enough recruits even to get off the ground.

This amalgamation is the very result of a desire to raise entry standards, the reasoning being summarized thus: raise entry standards=fewer recruits=lack of personnel to perform routine work=second tier=making that second tier attractive=amalgamation.

(b) The education proposals are similarly directly linked to the need for amalgamation.

The scheme foresees the provision of full-time education by the polytechnics. This again is impossible without amalgamation, for the education authorities have stated that they will not even consider providing full-time education facilities for four different bodies of accountants. They will only provide such training if they have only a single accountancy body with which to deal.

Mr Bourn's contention that the scheme may be split up into compartments is a common one, but, as we have endeavoured in brief to demonstrate, a misguided one. The need for amalgamation was the end-point of all the plans and thoughts the council had on the need to raise standards; it was not an adjunct, but the logical conclusion.

(2) Simple though the 'yes' or 'no' vote may appear, it is our firm belief that this overall appraisal of the scheme mirrors the way in which members of the Institute will be asked to vote in April of this year. Approval of the scheme in principle is necessary, because of the interlocking nature of its component parts before voting on the individual details can take place. For example, members might approve of the second tier whilst disapproving of integration – and yet for reasons outlined above, the one is not practical without the other.

ACASS therefore have no hesitation in stating that the student poll far from being, in Mr Bourn's words, 'simple-minded', is the only method by which the principles outlined in the scheme may be voted on; to do otherwise, in the first instance would itself be not only 'simple-minded', but even irresponsible.

Sprinkler Systems and Insurance

SIR, – Your Insurance Correspondent (February 15th issue, page 227) would stand a better chance of persuading us to install sprinklers if he refrained from elementary errors in presenting his case. Quite apart from his use of the long-discredited 'payback period' criterion for investment appraisal, he falls into the trap of quoting cost savings gross of tax (£1,992 per annum), when in the previous paragraph he has warned us against doing just that. Then he adds to this figure the annual cash benefit of capital allowances (£239) – calculated, incidentally, on the straight-line basis which for good discounted cash flow reasons nobody ever adopts!

We accountants really must stamp out this kind of loose thinking. It takes only a few minutes with a slide-rule to make the following calculation (assuming an investment cut-off rate of 15 per cent after tax, which is hardly excessive at present):

Gross cost of installation	15,000
Less Investment grant £6,000 × 0·870, assuming one year delay	(5,220)
Capital allowances £9,000 × 0·575 (from special present value tables) × 0·425 (tax rate) × 0·870 (one year delay)	(1,910)
Net present value cost	£7,870
Cost saving per annum £1,992 (gross) × 0·679 (net of tax factor, assuming two years' average delay in obtaining tax relief where premiums paid annually in advance, 1 – 0·425 × 0·756 = 0·679)	£1,350
Capital value (on the questionable assumption that the cost saving continues for ever) £1,350/0·15	£9,020
Capital value of ten years' cost saving £1,350 × 5·019	£6,790

If in development areas they take more than ten years to break even at 15 per cent, then either the cost of sprinklers must come down, or premium differentials (after some allowance for maintenance costs of the installation, which have been ignored in these calculations) will have to be dramatically increased. In the light of the rest of your correspondent's article, the latter possibility seems remote.

Yours faithfully,

K. H. MATTHEWS, M.A., A.C.A.

Capital Requirements of Practitioners

SIR, – The article, 'Capital Requirements of Practitioners', in your issue of January 11th must have given many practitioners considerable food for thought. Although your contributor did not take into account increased profits due to expansion or inflation, this does not vitiate his conclusions. The position can in fact be shown more simply as follows. The firm which he uses for his example has working capital amounting to 150 per cent of its net profit. If this ratio is maintained, then every £100 increase in profit – which can only produce at best £68 after tax and probably a good deal less – will need an additional £150 working capital. Or put even more starkly, every time profit is increased by £100 it is necessary to raise finance of at least £82 even though partners have no increase in drawings.

That the ratio of 150 per cent is not an exaggeration can be established by any practitioner who cares to calculate his work in progress at charging out rates less, say, 20 per cent and add this to debtors and equipment.

Your contributor in the worse of his two examples has postulated a 7 per cent inflation increase, and 3½ per cent expansion increase. I suggest that the real figures are far worse than these. In the case of my own firm I have established that the salary costs for all staff, including selective employment tax and National Insurance, have shown an increase of 52 per cent over the last three years, of this figure 10 per cent represents selective employment tax. If one assumes a 4 per cent per annum increase for overheads, partners' salaries, and profit and also assumes that on an average the amount of work for clients has increased by one-third in the last three years owing to legislation, it is possible to prepare the following table:

	Division of fees in 1965 per £100	Percentage increase	Revised 1968 fee for same work	Increased work assumed ⅓ at 1965 rates	Increased work revised to 1968 rates
	£	Per cent	£	£	£
Salaries:
Staff ..	38	52	58
				21	32
Partners	24	12	27
Overheads	18	12	20	6	7
Profit ..	20	12	23	7	8
	£100		£128		£47

The 1965 position is an arbitrary division but is probably not far removed from the actual position of many medium-sized firms. I have also assumed that in 1965 partners were fully employed and therefore additional work could only be coped with by increase in staff: the figure of £21 being one-third of the total figure of staff and partners' salaries.

From the above it would seem that on average a fee of £100 in 1965 should now be £175 for dealing with the affairs of the same client. This is equivalent to an annual increase of 25 per cent per annum on 1965 rates as against the figure of 7 per cent taken by your contributor and on which he bases his serious conclusions. If one excludes selective employment tax the increase becomes 23 per cent per annum.

As there is no sign of the end to inflation of salary rates and legislation it would seem that the fourth possible solution put forward by your contributor, i.e., allowing the introduction of outside equity capital may become a necessity.

Some of the assumptions I have made are of necessity arbitrary though not, I think, overstated but as I understand the Institute is participating in a Gallup Poll to establish certain facts about practitioners and staffs, it would be useful to extend the inquiry to ascertain the precise position of the profession's financing problems and the exact measure of the increase in fees for similar work which should have occurred in the last three years.

Overseas Company Tax Rates

SIR, – I would like to call your attention to an error in the report on overseas company tax rates on page 22 of your January 4th issue.

In the section for Venezuela, non-resident companies are shown as subject to an additional 15 per cent tax on net profits, after deduction of the basic income tax. In fact, this is only true for branches. In the case of subsidiary companies, the 15 per cent additional tax is not levied on profits, but only on dividends when paid or credited to the account of shareholders not domiciled in Venezuela; the law requires that this tax be withheld at the time of payment or credit to account and paid to the taxing authorities.

Yours faithfully,

Macro-economics

SIR, – It is encouraging to see articles like Paul Bareau's 'Gold – or Paper Gold' appearing in your journal relating to the macro-economics of the present situation. The question of aggregates is important whether we are discussing money, taxation, output or expenditure as Professor D. C. Rowan says in his excellent book, Output, Inflation and Growth. It seems to me that if we can keep in mind the equality relationship between the various factors of production, we are more able to appreciate that it is really a closed loop operation and that it must always be true that:

The value of the national output (or product) ≡ The value of national income ≡ The value of national expenditure

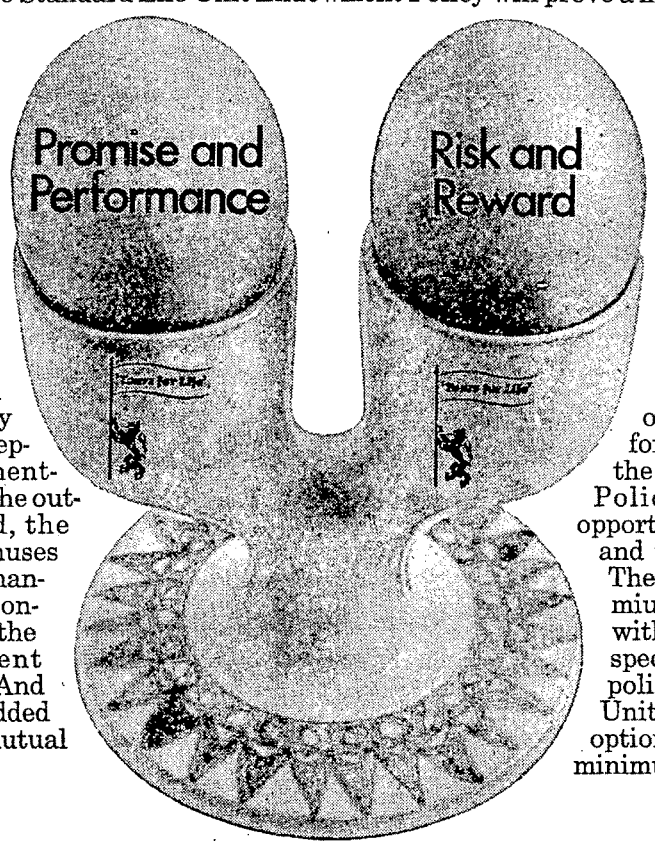
Their new Unit Endowment Policy therefore provides a valuable new investment channel, with a special appeal to those who have already protected their dependants. By widening the scope of investment opportunity while preserving some of the guarantees and protections of a with profit endowment assurance the Standard Life Unit Endowment Policy will prove a most attractive proposition.



1. Promise and Performance

The Standard Life With Profit Endowment Policy is well known as an exceptionally good investment-with-protection policy. The outstanding bonus record, the additional special bonuses and the record of sound management since 1825 all contribute significantly to the security and investment value of the policy. And Standard Life has the added attraction of being a mutual company.

2. Risk and Reward

Where the non-risk element of savings is prudently invested for the protection of dependants the Standard Life Unit Endowment Policy provides an outstanding opportunity to participate in the risks and rewards of the equity market. The investment element of the premiums of this policy is invested, with the emphasis on equity shares specifically for the benefit of the policy holder. The Standard Life Unit Endowment Policy offers many options and carries a guaranteed minimum death or maturity benefit.

TATE & LYLE, LIMITED, 21 Mincing Lane, London EC3

This, of course, is an over-simplification but it explains what is confusing to the lay person, when examining Government statistics, that the three aggregates of national income, national output and national expenditure are simply three ways of looking at the same thing, gross national product. It also enables us to say Saving ≡ Investment and then it becomes crystal clear that taxation, direct or indirect is simply a slice of the national income which, unless it is specifically saved or invested, is consumed.

So this is the lesson which the Chancellor of the Exchequer should learn. It is not a bit of use saying, Government expenditure is 'on target' or will be allowed to increase 'in real terms' by only 1 per cent. He should state quite categorically, in deciding how much taxation to impose, exactly what proportion of the diversion of the national income into Government coffers, is to be saved. And if he has to admit that he cannot save money then he had better leave it with those of us who can!

Restraint of Trade

SIR, – I have been following with great interest the series of articles you have been publishing called 'Is it Ethical?', and I venture to voice the opinion that if these were issued in booklet form, it may well prove a best seller inasmuch as it would cover subjects not at present found all in one volume.

The purpose of this letter, however, is to refer more particularly to the section on the restraint of trade, in the article in the January 18th issue. Speaking as a layman with some knowledge of the Courts I have watched with some concern the endeavours to maintain the old rigid ties which have kept the professional ethics of the legal profession, at least, at such a high level for so many years. Because the standards set were so high, a fall from grace was all the more disastrous, but latterly when the public seems to have acquired a taste for Roman holidays, publicity out of all proportion to the cause is accorded to the matter by the newspapers.

I think if any of the professions searched its collective heart, they might well find a few cases of the nature where advertising has been involved, not to mention poaching or undercutting. This leads one to question whether, in this day and age, anyone willingly allows himself to be impliedly bound by a code of honour which, to judge by the standards of many present-day Governments, would see to be outmoded and idealistic. Would the up-and-coming generations prefer to see the present rules relaxed? Do they feel that the 'old standards' are 'old hat?' If nothing is sacred (and chamber-pots with a Union Jack in the bottom can still be bought in Carnaby Street), why should the law's domestic domain be sacrosanct.

Devlin, J., was certainly being altruistic in the extreme in stating, 'This conduct could be thought disgraceful, not only by those of the profession but by outsiders who were not thus bound by the same standards'. Such a comment would only be applicable today if the maker of it had himself been adversely affected by such disgraceful conduct, for no doubt, if another were so affected, he would not be half so concerned.' Surely a more damning proof of this callous disregard for another's misfortunes is not more clearly demonstrated than by the poster currently appearing on British Railway stations, which says 'It's not your fault that Britain is going down the drain. It's the fault of the man standing next to you'. In the face of such irresponsibility perhaps Devlin, J., would have been inclined to reconsider his words.

Your contributor's final statement that 'the paucity of reported cases arising from disputes over professional jurisdiction indicates that the ethics are being observed and applied with respect and discretion', may well be considered as open to more than one interpretation. Could it not be that the ethics are those being invoked to prevent due accord being given to the individual circumstances of each case in open Court, which may well be the proper place for the dispute! Magna Carta did not concern itself with professional ethics, but it does say, 'Not only must justice be done, but justice must be seen to be done'. The private disciplinary courts of the professions should at least acknowledge this well tried standard, and while I would be the last to advocate washing dirty linen in public, if the public are to retain their belief in professional integrity then public condemnation of an offence is necessary.

Yours faithfully,
A. M. GUNTON, F.C.I.I.

Bureaucracy Gone Mad

SIR, – In the last days of January I remembered the near approach of the ripe old age of 60 (which I was due to reach on February 2nd) and, still enjoying my faculties, I set about reclaiming my post-war credits. I obtained the official form and dispatched it together with the relative certificates on Friday, January 31st – the following day, Saturday, being a dies non in office life – the next day, Sunday, my birthday, coincided with a business trip abroad.

It is true that the official form Part I: Who can claim – Class A, says, 'persons . . . who have reached the qualifying age (60 for men) . . .' but if I am not entitled to be repaid on my sixtieth birthday, the whole thing becomes a nonsense. However, I received an acknowledgement from the tax district to which I had sent the claim on February 8th, and on the 14th was amazed to receive, from another tax district to which my claim had been referred, the original claim form and certificates with a note which read, 'A post-war credit claim signed earlier than one day before the qualifying date is not valid in law. Will you please therefore re-sign and re-date the form'.

Does our overworked Inland Revenue really have time for this sort of thing? I can understand the wish to cut out doing work prematurely or ensuring that payment is not made before it is due, but it really is annoying to have the claim held up in this manner when it is obvious that some weeks since my birthday are going to elapse in any case before I receive payment, despite giving the Government over a quarter of a century's credit!

I begin to wonder whether the mysterious letters 'P.W.C.' do not, in fact, stand for 'Probably Won't Collect'.

Yours faithfully,
ERIC W. MACADIE, F.C.A.

FOR STUDENTS

Short Guide to the Transport Act 1968

THE Transport Act 1968 is a document of 281 pages with 166 sections and 18 schedules. It is somewhat complex in nature. Certain sections are difficult to comprehend and many of the innovations introduced do not come into effect until a later date. Indeed, so far as application is concerned, some provisions have yet to be finalized. For this reason it is only possible at this stage to give an outline of the main provisions.

2. The Act is partly an attempt to reorganize and rationalize the public transport facilities offered by road, rail and inland waterway, and partly to regulate the conditions of carriage of goods by road where some alteration seems necessary in the public interest.

3. Various new organizations have been or are to be set up to put the provisions of the Act into effect. These range from the National Freight Corporation to the projected Channel Tunnel Planning Council.

4. Perhaps the most notable innovation is the establishment of the National Freight Corporation. The purpose of this corporation, a public authority, is > 'to provide, or secure or promote, the provision of properly integrated services for the carriage of goods within Great Britain by road and rail; and to secure that in the provision of those services goods are carried by rail whenever such carriage is efficient and economic'.

Consideration is to be given to the needs of the person and the nature of the goods. The Corporation is also empowered, in connection with the above services, to provide such other services and facilities as appear expedient.

5. The National Freight Corporation is also to have power inter alia to:

(a) carry goods by road in or outside Great Britain either alone or in conjunction with the Railways Board;

(b) provide transport services by hovercraft;

(c) consign and store goods and enter into joint agreements with private carriers for the carriage of goods;

(d) hire out vehicles or other means of transport owned by them;

(e) operate harbours.

6. The Corporation will take over the bodies listed in Schedule 3 of the Act. These include inter alia, British Road Services, Pickfords, Tartan Arrow Service, THC Trustees and British Road-Railer Services. It will, in fact, take over responsibility from the railways for carriage of freight-liner containers and other high capacity containers.

7. The National Freight Corporation is not to be regarded as a common carrier.

8. A Freight Integration Council is to be established to deal with difficulties between the Freight Corporation, Railways Board, Docks Board, the Scottish Group, BOAC, BEA, the British Airports Authority and the Postmaster-General.

9. With reference to the carriage of passengers by road or ferry in England and Wales, there is to be established a public authority called the National Bus Co. This authority shall have power, inter alia, to:

(a) carry passengers by road in or outside England and Wales;

(b) carry passengers by vessel or hovercraft where this is a necessary part of the provision of road services;

(c) carry or store luggage and goods;

(d) let vehicles for hire for carriage of goods;

(e) act as travel agents;

(f) co-operate with other organizations, public or private, in the furtherance of these objects.

10. Another public authority is also to be established, known as the Scottish Transport Group. This group will combine the functions of the National Freight Corporation and the National Bus Co in Scotland.

11. The National Bus Co and the Scottish Group will take over the securities of the bodies listed in Schedule 7 to the Act, these being the better-known bus companies in the country.

12. With reference to passenger transport, the Minister has power to designate any area a passenger transport area governed by a passenger transport authority and executive. The business of the authority and executive will be to provide a properly integrated road transport system within that area. In doing so it may, inter alia, acquire existing bus companies, or grant concessions. It may require that adequate railway services are provided in certain instances. The powers of the executive are numerous, but concern principally the provision of adequate facilities for the carrying of passengers and goods, either directly or by delegation, and to indulge in any activity necessary to the proper fulfilment of this task. This includes the manufacturing of equipment, acquisition of land, and provision of houses, etc.

13. The Passenger Transport Executive will be expected to co-operate with other authorities, particularly the Railways Board and the National Bus Co.

14. There are various provisions as to the financing of the organizations referred to above and also with reference to their duty to give an account of themselves and periodically to review and revise their activities.

15. There are various provisions relating to inland waterways; these chiefly concern their maintenance and the provision of recreational facilities. To this end, an Inland Waterways Amenity Advisory Council is to be established.

16. The remaining provisions of the Act – apart from those that are, in effect, supplementary to the above – relate to the regulation of carriage of goods by road.

17. Each traffic area, under Part 3 of the Transport Act 1960 is to have a licensing authority accountable to the Minister.

18. With certain exceptions it will be necessary when a person uses a road vehicle for hire or reward or in connection with his trade or business, to have what will be known as an operator's licence. (The exceptions concern principally small goods vehicles. These are vehicles not more than 30 cwt unladen weight and with a plated weight not more than three and a half tons. References to the vehicle includes reference to the vehicle plus trailer.)

19. There are various detailed provisions as to the methods of applying for operators' licences, the granting or variation of these licences, their duration or conditions which may be attached to them.

20. For vehicles of 30 cwt or less see above. Goods may now be carried without A, B or C licences.

21. Special regulations are introduced with reference to large vehicles. These cannot be used on a controlled journey for the carrying of goods where the weight is greater than 11 tons unless special authorization has been obtained. 'Controlled journey' means a journey of more than 100 miles. A large vehicle is a goods vehicle other than a hauling vehicle with an unladen weight of more than five tons or a relevant plated weight of more than 16 tons.

22. Part 6 of the Act deals with drivers' hours, i.e., aimed at securing the observance of proper hours of work by persons carrying passengers or goods by road with the object of protecting the public against risks that arise when drivers suffer from fatigue.

23. Generally speaking a man may not drive for more than ten hours in any one working day. Proper intervals for rest and refreshment must be provided. The length of the working day is also governed as is the length of the working week, this being, subject to certain exceptions, about 60 hours.

24. The Act provides for the keeping of records and the installation of recording equipment in vehicles.

25. With reference to drivers' hours, the Act applies to passenger vehicles, i.e., public service vehicles and motor vehicles for carrying more than 12 passengers, and also to goods vehicles. With reference to operators' licences it applies to public service vehicles as well as to goods vehicles.

London Students' Management Services Course

NEARLY 60 members of the Chartered Accountant Students' Society of London attended a two-day course on management services on Thursday and Friday of last week at Winchester House, London.

The course, which was under the direction of Mr M. J. Blackburn, F.C.A., M.I.M.C., had been prepared by Touche, Ross & Co, and was designed to explain the development of management services in the United Kingdom and their relevance to the accountancy profession.

Case studies

A substantial part of the course was taken up by a series of actual case studies. These included the installation of a computer in a major confectionery manufacturers, and Mr G. B. Morrison, A.M.I.M.C., described in considerable detail the factors involved in installing a data processing system, highlighting the problems, pitfalls, and benefits in so doing. There was also a systems study by Mr M. P. Quick, B.A., an objective of which was a saving in staff through improved procedures.

Of particular interest was a playlet on a personal and organization structure study introduced by Mr F. A. Felton, C.ENG., M.I.E.E., M.I.P.M. This took the form of an interview between a consultant and his client in which those attending the course participated.

The final session consisted of predictions of the way in which a total information system for a major company would operate in 1975. With audio and visual aids, together with two narrators, two tape simulations and slides, it demonstrated how large businesses can be improved for management through an integrated approach to the management of information.

There followed an interesting and informative discussion arising from the lectures and case studies in which all the speakers participated. The course, without doubt, stimulated great interest among those students who attended and it was, in every way, a considerable success.

Views on Future Plans at W Wales Students' Dinner

THE scheme for the development of the accountancy profession was the principal theme of the speeches at the annual dinner of The West Wales Chartered Accountant Students' Society held in Swansea on Friday of last week, presided over by Mr W. H. Jones, B.COM., F.C.A., President of the Society.

The principal speaker, Mr J. C. Montgomery Williams, F.C.A., a member of the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, began by saying that it was not his intention to 'plug' the proposals, but to give those students present an outline of them so that they could form their own decisions as to the merits of the future plans.

Speaking with one voice

Mr Montgomery Williams emphasized that at present the profession tended to be untidy and undefined in scope. There was a proliferation of professional bodies, varying in their efficiency, and in their methods of training. However, despite this, he said, they covered similar ground but there was a lack of co-ordination between them and they were not, as a consequence, using their knowledge and experience for the benefit of the country. 'Under the scheme these bodies would be able to speak with one voice.' He also pointed out that under future plans, students would have greater representation within the Institute, being eligible to have members on the district society.

Turning to the education proposals, Mr Montgomery Williams said that he felt schoolmasters at present tended to regard accountancy as an 'O' level profession and that, as a result, many better-quality students were lost to the other professions. 'Future plans', he declared, 'would help to remedy this, for the Institute must raise its standards to be in line with the general educational trends in the country today'.

The second speaker was Mr Tony Williams, a member of the Executive Committee of the Association of Chartered Accountant Students' Societies. He began by criticizing students for not having taken greater interest both in the future plans and in student society activities. He said that the Executive Committee very much wanted students' ideas and constructive criticisms – 'only as a result of these views could the committee hope to become truly representative of national student opinion'.

He mentioned that the Executive Committee had frequent discussions with the Council of the Institute, who were interested in students and their opinions, but added 'there is little use in having the ear of the Institute if they had nothing to whisper into it. What was wanted was a two-way channel of communication between the articled clerk and the Institute'.

A sound foundation

Referring to the future plans, he said that they were not a 'universal panacea', but an attempt to lay the foundation upon which students, as future members of the Institute, could develop the profession. 'It is a beginning and should be welcomed as an attempt to bring about a much needed change of thinking and direction within the profession.' He felt that the plans were inadequate in certain aspects, notably the methods of education and whether they would compare favourably with university courses to intended students. He concluded by asking what thought the Institute had given to the transferability of articles to enable the student accountant to gain a wider field of training.

The final speaker was Mr R. P. Tovey, F.C.A., director, finance and administration, British Steel Corporation. Endorsing what Mr Montgomery Williams had said, he commented from his own practical knowledge as to the position of accountants in industry.

With regard to one of the main criticisms of the proposals, he said that the majority of accountants in industry look forward to being able to take articled clerks and would ensure that they obtained the necessary training.

An informal discussion followed, lasting over an hour, both on future plans and student societies. One of the main matters for concern which emerged during the discussion was that under the future plans scheme, specialism was to be introduced too early – before many students might fully be aware of the opportunities of each stream within the profession.

Company Balance Sheets: Inspection

Mr MARKS asked the President of the Board of Trade when company balance sheets are available for public inspection at the office of the Registrar of Companies; and what steps are taken to check that they have been deposited.

Mr DELL: If accounts are laid at an annual general meeting, they are required to be filed with the Registrar and so be available for public inspection, in general, not later than 10½ months from the end of the financial year of the company, or, if the company has overseas interests, 13½ months. The Registrar systematically reviews throughout the year whether companies have fulfilled their obligations to file accounts and reminds those which have not done so of their obligations.

AGENCY LEGISLATION AND PRACTICE ABROAD

A new handbook (No. 4 in the series providing information for British exporters) entitled Agency Legislation and Practice Abroad, has been published by the Board of Trade. Its aims are to bring to the attention of British exporters the existence in some countries of legislation which might give rise to unforeseen difficulties in the relationship between principal and agent.

In the United Kingdom, as in many other countries, no special legislation exists: principal and agent are bound by the terms of the contract between them which usually states quite clearly what is expected of each party, but there are many places where special legislation does exist.

This handbook, prepared by the Board of Trade's Export Services Branch, sets out for most countries in the world a brief statement showing whether any such difficulties are likely to be met. It does not attempt to summarize all legislation which might affect agency contracts.

Free copies of the handbook are available from the Information Division, UK Publicity Section, Board of Trade, 1 Victoria Street, London SW1.

INVESTMENT DECISIONS

The Investment System in the Firm is the title of the first of a series of booklets being published by the Institute for Operational Research. It deals with the process of decision-making in industrial firms, leading to investment of capital.

Further subjects in the series are to include investment appraisal, manpower planning and organization of design work.

The Institute is also arranging a series of seminars on the subject of capital investment, details of which may be obtained on request from the offices of the Institute, 56–60 Hallam Street, London W1.

Copies of the booklet are available from Research Publications Ltd, 11 Nelson Road, London SE10, price 15*s*.

Will Decimals destroy your office efficiency?

Decimalisation will be a nightmare unless you prepare NOW. Plan for D Day and the whole of the Seventies with Burroughs ABC machines

The count-down for D Day is on. Time is running out. If you don't start planning at once, your business could be heading for chaos, yet one of your most pressing decimalisation problems could be solved now—with Burroughs ABC business machines.

Burroughs ABC machines, ranging from adding machines, cash registers and accounting machines to electronic accounting systems, can be converted from £sd to Decimal—or back again—at the flick of a switch ! No waiting for engineers to call after D Day. The Industrial Training Act 1964 has established a system of industrial training boards which are responsible for all forms of training which occur in British industry.

As the author points out in his opening chapter, the system established by the Act is comprehensive and complex and it raises many problems concerning costs, grants, levies and benefits of training.

He outlines the basic approaches to costing used by accountants and then illustrates by means of forms and explanatory tables how budgets for training can be established.

He then goes on to outline routines for collecting training information and stresses that whilst information on how much training is done by a firm must be collected if grants are to be claimed, this does not mean that the costing system must be changed. Relatively minor adjustments will enable memorandum costs to be produced.

In his final chapters the author considers the uses to which training information may be put in controlling training and in planning the training function for optimum results.

Throughout, the book is lucid in style and amply illustrated with examples, diagrams and charts.

The author is a qualified teacher and cost accountant whose previous books include: Planning for Profits and A Simple Guide to Capital Expenditure Decisions and he has a wide first-hand experience of industry and management training in both the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Best Laid Plans . . .

THREE events in the past week demonstrate more clearly than any words why Britain has failed to resolve its basic economic problems. The first was the decision to raise Bank rate to crisis levels – not because sterling was under pressure, for if anything, sterling for the moment is showing unusual strength – but because the Government and the clearing banks cannot agree on the latter's lending policies. The second was the calamitous drift into a major labour dispute at the Ford company's plants which will disrupt the entire production and lose crucial exports. The final event was the publication by the Department of Economic Affairs of a 113-page 'Economic assessment to 1972' under the main title of The Task Ahead (HMSO, 10*s* 6*d*).

At first sight the decision to raise Bank rate is fully justified – at least in terms of economic theory. If devaluation is to succeed, and the massive increase in exports needed to produce a trade surplus of £300 million a year as prescribed by the new economic assessment is to be achieved, then a substantial cutback in the volume of resources allocated to the domestic market is necessary. The upward trend in clearing bank lending is contrary to this requirement and recent Government requests for a sharper squeeze have proved abortive. The reduction needed is marginal; about 4 per cent would be more than enough in a total of over £5,000 million of advances.

The real difficulty is to decide where the enforced reduction in private consumption should fall. The Government – now positively virtuous because the increase in its own planned expenditure is limited to 2 per cent in real terms – insists that the cut should be made at the expense of the private sector. In any case further demands are expected in the coming Budget. But as every reader of this journal will know, the Treasury's demand could not have come at a worse time for the private sector. Personal borrowing is high to meet tax commitments and the rising cost of living; business borrowing is high to finance the import levy, higher taxes and SET, as well as rising production and materials costs.

Not every businessman or personal borrower required to repay some part of his bank loan is likely to be driven into bankruptcy. On the other hand, for many such squeezed borrowers the expenses of meeting the banks' requests will be considerable. In some cases it may well mean that a small trader will have to wind up his affairs, simply because the prospects are so unpromising. What the Government completely fails to realize – and this is an economic point, not a political one – is the ineptitude of its own policy and the psychological effects thereof on the public. The real effect of higher Bank rate is simply to raise the cost of living still further; it has a disastrous effect on local authority finances and their consequent rate demands; it will mean that many house purchasers will never own their homes.

The Ford affair is calamitous, not because of its immediate repercussions on exports and production, but simply because it demonstrates again the inability of the official leadership of the trade unions to control their members, the futility of management trying to bargain with a labour force which is fragmented over a dozen unions, and the unwillingness of the Government to intervene in union disputes. The only really significant development in the entire affair is the use of a Court injunction to try and compel the union leaders to abide by their agreement with the company.

Nor is it merely in the factories and docks that the Government can expect labour troubles. The recent report from the Prices and Incomes Board on bank employees' salaries will almost certainly lead to some form of disruptive activity. The incomes policy is already in tatters, yet we still have Ministers contending that the same policy will be continued after the autumn regardless of whether or not it achieves its objective.

What, in the event, is the contribution of the Government to a solution of these problems? It is yet another paper on economic prospects! It is not a plan, because the Department of Economic Affairs has learnt that however much they may seek to refurbish the National Plan no one will see it as other than a bad joke. Last week's Green Book (that is, an official document designed to stimulate discussion on policy issues) makes all the obvious points. A surplus of £500 million by 1972 on the trade account is needed; and this can only be achieved by a reallocation of resources which will necessitate a rigorous prices and incomes policy; export prospects and the future of the UK economy depend ultimately on a continuation of a high and rising level of international trade.

But the question which anyone reading this Green Book will ask is nowhere answered, despite an introductory chapter of 13 pages headed 'The purpose of this document'. Who, in fact, is the document designed to inform? It is difficult to imagine that any literate citizen who is still unfamiliar with Britain's economic malaise and what is needed to remedy it will turn to this booklet for guidance. Nor, unfortunately, will the rank and file of the Ford workers find its contents particularly helpful, any more than will the dock employers, the haulage industry in the Midlands or the British Steel Corporation, in providing solutions to their individual problems. The Green Book which is really needed should provide a clear-cut statement of the alternative decisions open to any government. For it should clearly be understood, the advent of a new government is not going to solve the country's problems overnight.

The basic issues are simple enough. Either the total output of UK industry is increased to the point at which the demand for exports can be satisfied without cutting back consumer demand, or the domestic consumer must accept a reduction in his share of the GNP. If it becomes necessary, because productivity does not expand sufficiently, to cut back the domestic market's share of the GNP, where then do the cuts fall? How is it to be decided whether all or some part of the cuts shall fall upon the public sector or on the private sector? How are incomes to be regulated until such time as further cuts are unnecessary? So much for the distribution problem.

The crux of the situation is the fact that productivity in British industry is still not growing fast enough. In part – but only in part – this is a consequence of the continuing shortfall in industrial investment. The Task Ahead visualizes a '30 to 40 per cent increase by 1972' in private sector industrial investment. But suppose, because of flagging home markets and unco-operative labour, industrial leaders remain unwilling to embark upon this new investment? This issue is directly related to the problem of what is euphemistically described as 'productivity bargaining'. The labour representatives in Fords are merely following a practice which has become an integral part of such negotiations, that is, the money first and then a possibility of considering ways and means of increasing productivity.

It would be a mistake to believe that the solution is to be found solely in the factories and docks. In such industries it is possible to measure in fairly precise terms the gains in productivity, although it may not always be easy to ascribe them to the factors responsible. In the white-collar occupations it is far more difficult. Nevertheless it would be idle to pretend that there is not just as much waste of labour in some offices and institutions as in many factories. Whatever may be said of the Prices and Incomes Board – and by now most of the criticisms and insults must have been exhausted by those who have come within its scope – the Board remains the one agency which from time to time is prepared to comment publicly on facts which no politician dare raise.

Accountants have become rather tired of being told that they take too hard-headed a view of affairs, that for them profits are the sole criterion and proposals should only be implemented when they offer an economic return. But looking at the UK economy today, one cannot help feeling that if the Government would take a similar view of the public sector, concentrate on priorities and impose some unpopular decisions, the prospects would look decidedly better.

Institute's Records and Accounts on Computer

THE membership recording and accounting system of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, comprising the records of some 46,000 members, 17,000 students and 11,000 firms is being programmed by CMG (Computer Management Group) Ltd to be held on magnetic tape files. The files will be regularly updated at the group's Croydon Computer Service Bureau.

The updating process involves receiving magnetic tapes produced by an optical character reader which reads forms prepared at the Institute; updating the files with additions, amendments and deletions; and preparing extensive statistical lists, visual record cards and labels for mailing purposes. The mailing service will extend beyond the Institute's own requirements, covering the requirements of individual district societies and student societies.

Subscription accounting, including the issue of demands and reminders, will be carried out by CMG on the basis of the membership file for all members and students. The annually produced List of Members will be computer type-set from magnetic tapes.

Besides carrying out the membership accounting, it is planned that CMG will subsequently handle the Institute's examination procedures in respect of sending out application forms, mark processing and the notification of results.

Cost Benefit Analysis in Local Government

MORE than four-fifths of Britain's total investment is accounted for by public authorities, and of this about the same proportion is the responsibility of local government. On revenue account, local government spent nearly £4,000 million in the current financial year. How local authorities allocate this massive expenditure is of interest not only to ratepayers, and to taxpayers (who provide the Exchequer grants), but affects also the efficiency of the national economy.

While many irate taxpayers complain of 'waste' in local government – and no doubt this sector of the economy has its share like every other – a new publication Cost Benefit Analysis (price 70s) from The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants, suggests that those responsible for these expenditures are fully cognizant of their responsibilities to maximize the returns, social and financial, from any new outlays.

The volume comprises nine individual studies of experiments in the application of cost-benefit techniques undertaken by various local authorities, both county boroughs and counties. The experiments range from the extension of parking meter zones in Brighton to house refuse collection in Doncaster; from the development of industrial sites in Durham County to the problem of eviction from council houses for rent arrears in Reading.

It is arguable whether some of the experiments are well suited to the conventional techniques. Nevertheless, to the extent that the essence of this method of analysis is the determination and quantification of all variables and elements in the problem so as to arrive at rational solutions, the experiments have considerable interest.

The reports of the individual experiments are preceded by two essays; the first is by Mr J. D. Hender, F.C.A., F.I.M.T.A., Treasurer of Coventry, on the basis of cost benefit analysis and the problems it poses; and a second, expounding the basic techniques in simple terms, by Mr A. G. Wilson, of the Centre for Environmental Studies. The entire publication merits study by those interested in the financial problems of local government and the utility of cost benefit analysis in these fields.

Integration in the Professions

PROFESSIONALISM, far from being an outmoded concept, is a vital one. But its continued success depends on the ability of the professional bodies to evolve in step with modern standards and requirements. This has been realized by the accountancy and secretarial professions, and is clearly indicated by the plans for the integration of the recognized accountancy bodies on the one hand, and the Chartered Institute of Secretaries with the Corporation of Certified Secretaries on the other.

More recently, a further rationalization move in the professions proved successful when members of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors, the Chartered Land Agents' Society and the Chartered Auctioneers and Estate Agents' Institute voted at respective general meetings in favour of joining together as a single society under the title of The Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors. The operative date of unification will be June 8th, 1970, and in the meantime the respective Councils will be arranging the integration of staff and organization.

There are many professional or similar societies concerned with the sale, management and development of land and property. Some of these have already merged but there has remained a confusion of identity and a misunderstanding of function and examination standards. It is believed that the present merger will lessen this confusion, promote a single identity, and not only clarify functions and standards, but will enable training to be so improved that the profession will provide an increasingly efficient and comprehensive service in all its various fields of activity.

Scale fees have been the basis of charges made by members to their clients, but in A Report on the Supply of Certain Services by Estate Agents (HMSO, price 10*s* 6*d*) published last week, the Monopolies Commission recommends that national and local societies of estate agents should no longer use scale charges when acting on behalf of clients in the 'acquisition and disposal of dwellings'. What should be substituted for the scale is at present conjectural as the sort of time-basis adopted by the accountancy profession would not be appropriate to the transactions under review. Indeed, the nine societies' committee of estate agents (of which the RICS, CLAS and CAEAI are members) states 'It is one thing for the Commission to recommend the abolition of scale charges, but quite another for the Board of Trade to enforce a workable and publicly acceptable alternative'.

Monopolies Commission Condemns Recommended Resale Prices

SINCE the legal prohibition of resale price maintenance, some manufacturers and the distributive trades have adopted the device of recommended retail prices to avoid the dangers of 'cut-throat' competition which many feared might ensue. Although lacking any legal foundation, the recommended price was widely adopted, and in May 1967 the Board of Trade requested the Monopolies Commission to report on the effects of the new practice on the public interest.

In a House of Commons Paper published last week, entitled A Report on the General Effect on the Public Interest of the Practice of Recommending or otherwise suggesting Prices to be Charged on the Resale of Goods (HMSO, price 6*s* 6*d*), the Commission does not recommend a blanket prohibition of this development. The Commission considered the various arguments put forward to support recommended resale prices, some of which were similar to those used to justify resale price maintenance. The Commission found that where recommended prices were prevalent, prices tended to be more uniform but not invariably higher than where the recommendation was ignored by retailers and others.

As far as the public interest was concerned, the Commission felt that there were wide differences between the consequences in various trades. While clearly disliking the new practice, the Commission did not feel it necessary – except where investigation might show that consumers suffered some loss – to prohibit the practice. To this end the Commission recommended that there should be legislation to enable the Board of Trade to investigate, or refer to another body for investigation, any case in which the Board considered that recommended resale prices might operate against the public interest. If this were proved, then the Board of Trade could exercise its power to prohibit the recommending or suggesting of resale prices.

Excavation Expenditure as 'Plant'

BY a majority of three to two the House of Lords recently upheld the decision of the Court of Session in Barclay Curle & Co v. CIR, concerning capital allowances in respect of a dry dock.

The Court of Session had dismissed an Inland Revenue appeal against a decision of the Special Commissioners in connection with expenditure of £500,380 on concrete work for the dock. The Court had allowed an appeal by the company in connection with the expenditure of £186,928 on excavating land for the dock. It held that all this was expenditure on 'plant', qualifying for initial allowance of three-tenths and not expenditure on a 'structure' on which the allowance would be only three-twentieths.

Lord Reid said he thought the Special Commissioners had misdirected themselves in holding that the expenditure on excavation was 'too remote' from the provision of a dry dock. Lord Guest and Lord Donovan agreed. Lord Hodson and Lord Upjohn (dissenting) thought the dock was a 'structure'.

Assessment of Means

ONE of the more interesting developments in thinking on the public welfare services has been the arguments adduced in favour of selectivity; in other words, that assistance should be given only to those members of the community who can show need for such assistance. Although the bulk of welfare services are universally provided, in contrast to the principle of selectivity, there are, nevertheless, many instances in which assistance to those in need requires an assessment of the financial resources and commitments of the applicants.

Quite apart from the determination of supplementary benefits by the Ministry of Social Security, there is also the question of contributions under the National Health Service Act in respect of hospital services, the Children's Act, financial assistance to students and to their parents, as well as housing subsidies to tenants. More recently, the Rating Act 1966 introduced rate rebate schemes for those in need.

Despite the widespread need for assessment scales relating to local authority social services, a survey of 36 local authorities undertaken by The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants has revealed that few local authorities have yet attempted to rationalize their assessment scales and procedures. Of these 36 authorities only one has adopted a basically identical method of determining assessable income for all services; at the other extreme, one authority makes use of 16 different methods.

The IMTA has reproduced as a separate publication entitled Assessment Scales (20s net), Volume II of the Institute's Financial Information Service without the appendices (which are extracts from legislation). The object is to make this information covering the various procedures and requirements of the law in respect of rents, education services, and welfare services, more widely available. Readers involved in these matters will find this an extremely handy reference work.

New Capital Issues

THE amount raised by issues of equities in 1968 was £364 million, that is, five times as great as in the previous year and markedly higher than in any other year since 1961. At the same time substantial sums were still being raised through issues of fixed interest securities.

Nevertheless, this record total of ordinary share issues contributed only a little over one-half of the total for companies last year. This was due partly to the fact that the value of convertibles issued in 1968 was more than four times as high as in 1967, and more than twice as high as in the previous record year, 1964.

Together with these findings, the Midland Bank Review for February, in its survey of the capital market, notes that, in contrast with the private sector market, that concerned with public sector issues was very quiet. In total this failed to pass the £200 million mark; indeed, at £188 million the total was £63 million below that of the previous year. This sum accounted for only 22 per cent of all new issues in 1968 against 37 per cent in the previous year.

A number of factors seem to have contributed to the upsurge in equity issues. Although company profits rose quite sharply in 1968 and the bulk of private sector investment is normally financed from retentions, tax liabilities have also increased substantially. At the same time credit restraint has been intensified, so that companies have not been able to rely upon bank financing to the same extent as in earlier years. Stocks also appear to have fallen early in 1968 and some finance was needed for re-stocking.

During 1968 there were 35 offers for sale made on a tender basis compared with only four in 1967; but many of these were sales of existing securities and involved no new money. Even so, 20 such offers raised nearly £9 million last year, against less than £1 million in 1967.

While the outlook for 1969 is not easy to assess, the Review says there are indications that the pattern of new issues in 1969 will be much the same as last year, with perhaps another record amount being raised.

More Budget Advice

ANXIETY on the future financing of agriculture is expressed by the Country Landowners' Association in a recent memorandum to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Suggesting an end to further capital taxation of agricultural land, the Association argues the need for a long-term taxation policy which would encourage the creation of wealth and the continuation of agricultural estates with sufficient funds to provide the injection of new capital essential from time to time, and to avoid fragmentation of sound economic enterprises. It is pointed out that the minimum acreage that can be farmed with proper efficiency is continually increasing, and so is the capital involved.

The memorandum also stresses the need for time to pay estate duty which might well prevent the breaking up of estates and farms, at present provoked by the relatively short period allowed for payment. Instead of the eight years over which can be spread payment of duty assessable on the last death, it is recommended that the period should be extended to twenty years.

In 1949 the maximum rate of estate duty was 80 per cent applied to estates of over £1 million, but between 1949 and 1968, the value of money fell to about one-third of the 1949 value. This meant that the 80 per cent rate was now charged on estates which, in 1949, were worth only £350,000. The CLA urges, therefore, that the 80 per cent rate should apply only to estates exceeding £3 million, with similar adjustments all along the line, and that the burden of estate duty in real terms should be pegged to the 1949 level. These proposals would be particularly important to owner-occupier farmers where the new levels of capital value now bring 300–500 acre farms into high brackets for estate duty, and make it unlikely that a son will be able to carry on the farm without breaking up the unit.

Investments in other spheres were the subject of another memorandum submitted by the Wider Share Ownership Council. This is in furtherance of the proposals for tax concessional thrift plans which the Council have been urging upon the Chancellor and the Treasury since May of last year.

As in their opinion the volume of personal savings and investment remains inadequate due to high taxation and inflation, the Council has made proposals as to how savings can be attracted into media which serve as a counter-inflationary weapon. These comprise new tax concessions for savers in thrift-plan funds to be set up by employers, the subscriptions being by deduction from wages (or salaries). The participators would have the right of option in putting part or all of their contribution into some form of investment in equities.

Regarding direct taxation, the Council recommends that the first £500 of realized gains, less losses, in any one year should be exempted from capital gains tax.

THIS IS MY LIFE

Pay-off on Investment

by An Industrious Accountant

SOME weeks ago our middle-level accounts staff became resentfully vocal at what they claimed to be a shortfall in their development programme. More management-type courses, more residential seminars, more personnel-oriented techniques, they wanted. They'd had their full share of talks on taxation, DCF, and balance sheet interpretation; they sought for development to boardroom potential.

Well, fair enough, we thought. Maybe there is a marshal's baton in every accountant's knapsack, or a chairman's gavel in every travel-worn black briefcase, so give them the chance to prove themselves. Within a month both Tishy, the number two in Costs, and the assistant internal auditor, were spending the week-end at an old country house for a course on advanced management techniques.

They were in great form when they returned. They had listened to talks on assessing your junior staff, simulation model rationals, and stimulating creativity by operational research. They had sheafs of typed handouts and scribbled notes, some not altogether legible except by inspired guesswork, and they interloaded every conversation with impressive new jargon. They gave a packed departmental meeting an enthusiastic résumé of their seminar. In short, the project had been a success.

But somehow, as the days went by, these two would-be tycoons seemed to look sullen and sour. Their free flow of speech diminished to monosyllables; they were pointedly non-contributory during section heads' discussions. In short, our best laid plans were ganging agley. So I asked them what the problem was.

After some preliminary foot-shuffling and muttering they came clean. They were suffering from anti-climax. It was frustrating to their ambitious outlook to be unable to implement rapidly all the theories of the brave new world they had visited. Without subsequent action, the enterprise was a waste of time, What, they asked, did I intend to do about it?

It seemed only reasonable to ask in return what they proposed should be done. They were the ones who had seen the vision; what positive suggestions for departmental efficiency or for company improvement had they brought back? The onus was on their broad shoulders to ensure a pay-off for our expenditure in time and money.

It wasn't that easy, they said sulkily. They had, for example, suggested to the sales manager that he should construct a table-top scale model of the store with all departments and fittings set out in miniature precision, so that alternative redeployment layouts could be reviewed on a network analysis basis. He had rejected the idea. Our workshop people hadn't the time, he said, and it would cost too much, anyway. Besides, he didn't want any major changes at this stage.

They had also suggested, to the personnel director this time, that he might set up a special committee to structure a review of junior staff of possible executive potential. The terms of reference should include a survey of the benefits to be derived from the behavioural sciences, from dynamic systems research, and from an IQ investigation.

Prinny had listened inscrutably, offered qualified approval in principle and postponed the action stage until next year. His staff were up to their tonsils in the new wage-claim negotiations, he said apologetically. Besides, our annual appraisal forms gave him all the data he wanted.

They had other similar grievances but, with all due sympathy, I felt they had missed the point. Their priority should surely be to introduce improvements in their own sections. If this paid off, I went on, we'd see if we might utilize their new-look impact to greater all-round benefit.

But that all seemed a bit too protracted and hit-or-miss to them. They wanted jam today. Why waste time and money on sending them on management courses, they asked reasonably enough, if the firm didn't exploit their newly acquired knowledge?

Some Reminiscences

on the Occasion of the Golden Jubilee of

by STANLEY J. D. BERGER, O.B.E., M.C., F.C.I.S., formerly Director and Secretary

Today, March 8th, 1969, The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants – one of the two principal specialist accountancy bodies in Britain – attains its golden jubilee. We congratulate the Institute on this achievement and we thought the occasion fitting to invite the one who can fairly be described as the 'architect' of the ICWA – Mr Stanley Berger, who for thirty of the fifty years was its secretary and director – to recount what he terms 'a few highlights of nearly a lifetime's work in a cause in which I believed'.

I HAVE often been asked how I came to be associated with The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants and although it is difficult to answer in one sentence, I can say definitely that it had no relation to immediate prospects. The Institute was in a parlous condition – not in enthusiasm nor in basic principles – but in practical terms of finance; there was hardly sufficient to pay a modest weekly salary. At this time Lord Leverhulme, the first President of the Institute, had said:

> 'What the compass is to the mariner under modern conditions of navigation as compared with steering by stars or by sight under old-world time conditions, so is an efficient costing system to modern conditions of commerce'.

At about the same time, Sir Herbert Austin (later Lord Austin) said:

> 'I believe that the Institute, if it is properly conducted and efficiently managed, has an extremely bright and valuable future'.

These sentiments appealed to me as a young man leaving college and war-time service to start a new and worth-while job of work. The chance to help to develop a body of men who could assist management in the urgent need for greater efficiency aroused my enthusiasm and prompted me to accept the offered post. I was always interested in 'persons' rather than 'things' – hence my acceptance.

Early days

Those early days were not easy and many hoped-for personal amenities had to be sacrificed. Even my wife-to-be shared in this and after we were married she became my most loyal and consistent supporter which she has remained to this day. It was no uncommon activity for both of us to spend our evenings addressing envelopes for which we could not afford paid labour.

The Institute started with its registered address in a solicitor's office; then a small shared office in Grosvenor Gardens, SW1; then at Duke Street, St James's, SW1, and later to more commodious modern premises in Queen Square, WC1, before moving to the present premises in Portland Place, W1, soon after the end of the war.

During the Second World War the Institute headquarters moved out of town to a house in Kingswood, Surrey (which also served as a home for my wife and family), and later to a larger house in the same village. It was at this time our Queen's Square premises suffered from a direct hit next door by an enemy bomb which killed two people and damaged our remaining office equipment and library. The library was afterwards moved to a Nissen hut at Kingswood.

By this time we had registered students from all parts of the world, many of whom were anxious to come to Britain to gain practical experience – an essential qualification for membership apart from passing the examination. I recall with vivid memory the case of an Indian student with whom I had been in prolonged correspondence in which I pointed out the great difficulty (and it was a very great difficulty in those days) of obtaining an appointment in the UK even at the low salary he was prepared to accept. The colour bar was much greater than it is today.

However, notwithstanding my warnings, on a Christmas Eve at Kingswood there was a knock on the door, and lo and behold, he presented himself full of enthusiasm and confidence with the greeting, 'Well, here I am; please find me a job'. His total possessions were a kit bag and £2 in money. A snow blizzard was blowing so we offered him a bed and meals, and after the holidays we finally got him a job as a cost clerk. Today he is director and financial controller of a well-known firm in India. He never ceases to express his gratitude for the help we were able to give him.

From the very earliest days the Institute had always stipulated a high standard of admission to membership but we also had to obtain the maximum publicity. It was no use hiding our light under a bushel; it had to be seen and appreciated. Hence the early founders sought the patronage of prominent industrialists to hold honorary office as President and Vice-Presidents.

Lord Leverhulme held the first office with dignity and enthusiasm until his death in 1925. He was followed by Mr W. Howard Hazell, Chairman of the well-known printing firm of Hazell Watson & Viney, whose belief in costing is epitomized in his remark that 'if I was a dictator, one of the first things I would do in order to benefit industry would be to pass an edict that every manufacturer must have a good costing system for his works'. That was over 40 years ago but although no dictatorial edict has been issued, a great number of firms today have voluntarily recognized the essentiality.

The second decade of the Institute's existence was marked by a radical change in the basis of selection for the office of President and consequently in the practical duties and responsibilities attached to it. We were more than grateful to the eminent Presidents and Vice-Presidents who had given us so much support and publicity, but bearing in mind the importance of securing full professional recognition, it was decided that these offices must be filled by members of the profession actively associated with the work and policy of the Institute. This was an essential part of the progress towards the ultimate goal.

Mr Donald L. Moran, a fellow of the Institute, was chosen as the first President under the new régime and he became the forerunner of the many effective Presidents who have followed him since.

Practical experience

Practical costing experience has always been a precondition of membership. That recalls to me the case of a chartered accountant who passed the ICWA examinations but whose application for membership was turned down on the grounds of insufficient practical experience. He was most indignant and explained with much forcefulness that he was a chartered accountant, a Master of Arts of Oxford and a partner in a well-known firm of chartered accountants. I quietly informed him that even if he was President of the Institute of Chartered Accountants and Master of his college he could not become a member of the ICWA without fulfilling the experience condition.

He went away much distressed but a year or two later he came back with evidence of the required experience and he was admitted. I shall never forget his expressions of appreciation that the ICWA had held fast to their conditions which made him value membership more than ever.

In research it was recognized that a great potential lay in the experiences of individuals if they could be persuaded to communicate to their professional brethren either through the journals or at national conferences. In the case of the latter it was found that rather limited numbers attended and often the same people year after year. It was therefore decided that if members could not come to the national conferences, the conferences should be taken to them. Thus started the practice of holding regional conferences, with very gratifying results.

Likewise in the matter of subject research. Research meetings in London were not the easiest way of attracting contributions from individual members, so research subjects were handed out to individual branches and the results were equally gratifying. A Technical Officer was appointed to encourage and co-ordinate the various research projects which were simultaneously operating in different parts of the country. Nationally, research projects were carried out with the Institution of Production Engineers and The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants, and joint publications were issued.

Overwhelming demand

During the Second World War there was an overwhelming demand for cost accountants in the various Government departments. Some Ministers had at last recognized that checking costs meant more than checking figures of expenditure, and that using costing techniques could expedite production and save the country many millions in cash. Although members of the ICWA were earmarked as being in a 'reserved occupation' it was physically impossible to meet all demands.

At one time it was suggested that the Institute should become an international body catering especially for all the commonwealth countries such as Australia, Canada, India and New Zealand. It was felt, however, that these countries would be wiser to have their own Institutes – and in fact today they do so exist. South Africa and Rhodesia were the exceptions and to this day they strongly adhere to the UK body and conditions.

When we are very young, 'next week' often seems a long way off. As one progresses through life, time begins to pass a little more quickly but even then 50 years hence seems an incredibly long shot. But now The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants is to celebrate its fiftieth anniversary, and although the complete history will no doubt appear in due course, it is hoped that these few personal reminiscences may be of interest to readers.

Farm Management Accounting

by IAN McGLASHAN, C.A.

FROM time to time there are articles on farm management accounting in the professional Press and there is a good number of books on the subject. But little on the whole has emerged from qualified accountants actually engaged in the farming industry; no doubt because farms large enough to employ such accountants must be few. The present writer is in a business of which farming is a side interest, and he personally has to cope with the actual problems of farm book-keeping. One reason for this short article is that, to some extent, from the impression gained from the books one reads on the subject, it would seem that few of the authors have actually done their farm book-keeping.

The NAAS

The National Agricultural Advisory Service, thanks no doubt to various departments of economics at the farming colleges throughout the country, has produced a vast literature on this subject. It has not only paved the way but tarmaced it, too. There is a host of statistics available with which one can compare one's farming results.

One can discover almost any fact one wishes to know – from the average farm income per acre in one's own area, to what yield per acre may be expected from sugar beet. The approach to the subject is that excellent one of marginal costing. Each crop producing its own margin over prime – prime being cost of seeds, fertilisers, sprays and casual labour (such as potato pickers). Established wages are treated, very properly, as overheads.

The summarized accounts would read as follows:

Crop margins
Livestock margins
Less: Wages
Plant costs
Overheads
Profit		£

More than most men, as any accountant in practice knows, farmers dislike book-keeping. But they are beginning to realize that keeping records can be of value. The writer's criticism of the NAAS is that the records they are advising farmers to keep are still far too elaborate. For example, the Farm Business Records Book put out by the National Farmers Union which bears on page 1 the following:

> 'At the request of the NFU this Farm Business Records Book has been designed by the NAAS in consultation with accountants'.

It is a beautifully produced loose-leaf job of some 50 printed pages; but it is so complicated that even the writer would be hard put to follow it, with some subsidiary objections such as that the cash columns are too small. But no doubt the idea is to encourage the farmer to keep details of his pay-in slips.

The Ministry is now offering a bribe to farmers, who will keep proper records – it is willing to pay, virtually, their accountants' fees. What is remarkable is that any farm company – even although it keeps the most meticulous records – employing a fully qualified accountant, is unable to draw the grant.

Book-keeping

The simpler the book-keeping system the better. At one time in the writer's firm we kept a purchase ledger and a purchase day-book. But no longer. The basics are:

(i) Cash-book. None of the stock rulings available through stationers have been found to be satisfactory; one is as likely as not to find no column for wages. We show discount, and we reconcile with the bank and rule off monthly. We also keep a petty cash-book, columnar ruled. This is posted by double entry to the

(ii) Ledger. Kalamazoo loose-leaf, double ruled, except for crop and pig accounts which require a special ruling. Our ledger has columnar ruling which we use for seed, fertilizer and spray accounts. Where possible, we post such items direct to crop account, but one cannot always do this.

Ideally the crop accounts, such as potato, barley, should be headed:

Dr. Seed. Fertilizer. Spray, Casual labour. Misc. Total

One advantage of having an account for each crop is that it enables one to see whether all has been charged that should be. It is easy to forget to put through charges for seed grown on the farm, or on contract; in the latter instance no charge is made by the merchant for the seed he supplies – he merely deducts its cost from the cheque he pays you post-harvest. These adjustments, naturally, do not affect profit one way or another, but they do affect such statistics as yield per acre in £s.

(iii) If the ledger is not ruled to give the information required, a records book to show quantities should be kept. One of the annual headaches is how much to reserve at the year-end for subsidies not received. This is a complicated calculation, and one has to know what has been sold, as well as when and what subsidies have been received on what.

(iv) A Statistics Book is most important. This can contain any data thought to be useful. Our data range from annual accounts summaries to monthly births per sow. An annual summary of fields by crop is most useful.

Valuations

The Inspector of Taxes will accept one's own annual valuation, as long as this is consistent; but many farmers like to have it done by a professional valuer.

There is no ideal year-end. The traditional ingoing to a farm is Michaelmas (September 29th), by which time most of the crops will have been harvested. But probably March 31st is the favourite date, at which time most of the crops should be in the ground.

Whatever the date, the farm book-keeper is faced with the problem of overlap. If the year-end is September 30th his sugar beet crop and potatoes have still to be dealt with in the following year; if it is March 31st, all his spring cultivations accrue to his new crop.

Farm valuations include the cost of labour and plant in the cultivations necessary for preparing a seed bed and sowing, harrowing and rolling – the inexperienced would be surprised to know how much work is required in doing this. It is therefore necessary to isolate this by deducting from the valuation figure the known costs of seed and fertilizer (net of subsidy). And this can make for complications in the crop account if one is not careful.

Fertilizer account is in any case apt to be something of a headache. First, there is the matter of subsidy. One has a choice of being paid this direct by the Ministry, or of instructing them to pay one's supplier; if you opt for the former, you have to see that the credit received goes where it should. Secondly, do you post direct to crops or to fertilizer account? Thirdly, do you rule your fertilizer ledger account (columnar naturally) under varieties or crops? Fourthly, usage has to be reconciled with stocks.

Trading budget

The trading budget is an easy exercise, especially under the recommended basis of marginal costing. All relevant data is obtainable from the NAAS on number of hundredweights per acre of fertilizer per crop, to bushels per acre of seed to be sown. It is when actual is set against budget that one realizes the snags inherent in overlapping years. One of these is the difficulty of explaining to a farmer that wages paid in March have to go against the budget when he knows very well that the bulk of them have been incurred on his new crop.

In budgeting it is to be assumed that opening and closing cultivation costs are the same.

Having prepared the trading budget, what then do you do with it? Indeed, what use is it anyway in an industry so largely dependent upon fate? One has little idea what price potatoes will fetch, and a potato crop can make or mar your business. Once the crops are in the ground, no amount of statistics will help. So that no amount of sophistication will give your farmer much more information – sooner than he knows himself anyway – on how his wheat or barley has run.

But this is not to deny two things. That statistics are the lifeblood of any profitable enterprise; and that the farmer can at least control some of his expenditure.

The writer uses an annual budget with columns for the first three-quarters' expenditure; from this can be seen whether the expenditure at least will be on target. As soon as the crops are in the barn, one can tell whether they are quantitatively in agreement with budget. And one can say with some degree of confidence by September (and our year ends on March 31st), what the profit will be. The budget might appear as follows:

	Qr. 1	Qr. 2	Qr. 3	Costs	Quantity	Income
	£			£		£
Wheat	1,760			1,620	5,400[c]	6,750
Oats	120			120	405[c]	486
Barley	793			850	2,700[c]	3,240
Potatoes ..	1,788			2,300	500[t]	6,500
Beans	954			605	55[c]	1,650
Peas	396			560	980[c]	2,472
	5,811			6,055		21,058
Margin on pigs				—		760
Plant exp. ..	850			3,500
Wages	1,427			4,800
Overheads ..	675			3,113
				17,468
Profit				4,350
				£21,818		£21,818

Separate summaries are prepared for the details of plant and overheads, and a monthly profit and loss account prepared for pigs.

From the above details at the end of Quarter 1, we can see that wheat and beans have gone into the red – whereas we have saved on barley and peas. The answer, in fact, is that most of the fields we sprayed this year for wild oats (an increasing hazard) were under beans, whereas the peas were grown on contract and we have not yet made the adjustment for the cost of seed supplied by the corn merchants.

There is further expense still to come on the potato crop – for a burning-off spray and picking wages.

Plant, wages and overheads are running reasonably well – these should run fairly evenly quarter by quarter.

All one can say at this stage as far as income goes, is that all crops look well except the peas, which have rather suffered from the pigeons.

It may be added here, that a cash budget is worth doing if you can run on an overdraft as most farmers do. The eternal problem is, do we sell at once or store our cereals?

The only experience of livestock the writer has had much of is with pigs. The authority on this is not the NAAS but the PIDA (Pig Industry Development Authority) – and authority they are. They have statistics on everything from the amount of food a sow will eat in a year, to the relative profitability of weaners and baconers. The important factor in pig production is statistics. Does one get two litters a year? Are the sows sufficiently fertile? What is your food conversion rate? How do your baconers grade out?

There are, in particular, two data everyone should keep – the percentage which cost of food bears to income; and the number of live births. If you know the latter you know your deaths, and this can be surprising; and since food is by far the biggest item of cost, it is the one to watch the closest.

One small point: with livestock it is customary to treat stockman's wages as a direct cost.

Break even

There is a short cut method the writer has used which may be worthy of note; this is what is termed the 'break even'.

At around December 31st (three months before the end of the financial year) we do a trial balance, making such reserves as we can for all items of expenditure and for crop income, but nothing for closing valuation even although costs thereof – such as autumn sown seed and fertilizer – have been included. The balance on profit and loss is therefore the figure which the closing valuation would have to be if one were to break even. This figure is then compared with the previous year's figure at this time and, all things being even, the difference between the two figures will be the variance on this year's profit and loss account. This is repeated at the end of January and February, but by the end of February the comparison is much more likely to be with the opening valuation rather than with last year's break even. It acts as a cross check at worst.

The Significance for SET Refunds

by H. S. A. MACNAIR, F.C.A.

THE Selective Employment Payments Act 1966 was passed into law on August 9th, 1966, but was substantially amended by the Finance Acts of 1967 and 1968. Further amendments are foreshadowed by the proposal to substitute the 1968 revised edition of the Standard Industrial Classification for that produced ten years earlier, which itself replaced the first edition in 1948. An amendment list issued in 1962 was incorporated in a consolidated edition published in 1963, and it was this version which was designated for reference purposes by section 10 (1) of the 1966 Act.

It will not be necessary to await the Budget resolutions or Finance Bill since section 9 (1) of the 1966 Act empowers the Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity, with the consent of the Treasury, to order by statutory instrument the required substitution although a draft must first have been approved by resolution of each House of Parliament.

Stick and carrot background

The selective employment tax was imposed with remarkable uniformity by Part VI of the Finance Act 1966. This uniformity results from the integration of the tax with National Insurance contributions. For the year commencing September 5th, 1966, the tax was granted at the weekly rate of £1·25 per man (£0·625 per woman or boy and £0·40 per girl under the age of 18), but from September 2nd, 1968, these rates have been raised to £1·875 per man, £0·9375 per woman or boy under the age of 18 and £0·60 for girls.

Not only is this rod of taxation taken off for those classified in hard-core (see hereunder) industry, or mitigated for particular classes of employees, but a reward is made available for those who do the right thing in the right place at the right time. Originally a premium for hard-core employers was granted with effect from September 5th, 1966, at the rate of £0·375 per week per man (£0·1875 per woman or boy and £0·125 per girl) but for weeks commencing after March 1968 this was terminated by section 1 of the Revenue Act 1968, except as regards relevant establishments situated wholly within a development area, The scale of rewards for the latter had in the meantime been augmented with effect from September 4th, 1967, by section 26 of the Finance Act 1967 to the current (combined) level of £1·875 per man, £0·9375 per woman or boy and £0·60 per girl. These are all additional to the refunds of tax paid.

Hard-core industry

It is still convenient to refer to establishments which rank for refund of selective employment tax by the adjective 'hard-core' which may previously have applied aptly to the manufacturing sector entitled to the premium. Taking the 'software' sector of the economy as its converse, it remains to delineate the perimeter between them.

In what follows it is proposed to consider the changes introduced in the 1968 classification and certain decisions of the Industrial Tribunal and the Courts in relation to the existing layout. First, however, it will be helpful to look at the principles of interpretation expounded by the House of Lords in Lord Advocate (for Minister of Labour) v. Reliant Tool Co (46 ATC 367).

Viscount Dilhorne explained that the expression 'minimum list heading' (in the Standard Industrial Classification) refers not only to the arabic numerals (in groups of three) set out under that term in the margin but also the adjoining narrative. This is divided between a textual title, printed in bold type, and an amplified description in lighter type; but where the latter is absent section 10 (4) of the 1966 Act provides that the heading is to be construed as referring only to the manufacture of the goods specified in that title. This guideline is stated to apply only as regards Orders III to XVI but the new classification has been expanded so that Order XIX now takes the place corresponding to the existing Order XVI (OTHER MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES).

Specified activity

Section 10 (5) has the general rule that in determining the activities falling under any particular minimum list heading, regard is to be had to any express provision of any other heading, although the latter is to be disregarded if it requires a secondary attachment of an activity primarily attributable elsewhere. The word 'activities' must be given its ordinary natural meaning.

The Tribunal in the Reliant case recorded their opinion that to be 'engaged in the activities of manufacture' of a product does not mean that one has to take the product through every stage of its creation, from raw material to finished product. It is sufficient if one is responsible for any stage in the process of manufacture.

Qualification for premium under the 1966 Act was principally related to employment in (or carried out from) an establishment engaged by way of business wholly or partly in activities falling under any of the headings in the manufacturing group of Orders noted above. Lord MacDermott read 'falling under' as the equivalent of 'included in'. The Tribunal had held that a business of designing machine tools on a contract basis for various manufacturers fell under the heading 332, METAL-WORKING MACHINE TOOLS.

The learned judge's approval of their decision that the activities lay on the manufacturing side of the line which marks off what is simply preliminary was based on the existence of a relationship between the preliminary and subsequent processes which was particularly intimate and direct and not at one or more removes. The decision reflected a state of affairs in which the designs pervaded and were essential to all that followed, in the sense that they informed and controlled the subsequent steps and stages of the manufacture.

Re-arrangement of headings

Current activity in take-over bids indicates that food, drink and tobacco manufacture represents a notable section of industry and this group comprises Order III in which there are few changes in the 1968 minimum list headings, although these are described as being among the most important in relation to the borderline between manufacturing and service industries (Statistical News, 3.21).

Thus milk processing and bottling depots were previously included in 810.2 (wholesale) and 820.2 (retail), but are now in 215.1 which comprises HEAT TREATMENT OF MILK – pasteurizing etc., and homogenizing liquid milk for wholesale and retail distribution. The above-mentioned minimum list headings 810 and 820 now appear in Order XXIII in place of Order XX. Milk product manufactures appear in 215.2 with the additional mention of fresh and preserved cream. Yoghurt is included although not mentioned by name, as appears from United Dairies (London) Ltd v. MOL ([1967] ITR 596).

In Shorey Hodgkinson & Cover Ltd v. MOL ([1967] ITR 594) a company functioned as assistants to importers of colonial produce. Bulk goods such as rice and dried fruits were collected on arrival, sieved several times, dry-cleaned, packed and labelled. The Tribunal held that this ranked as a distribution service because the property in the goods had passed from the producers to the importers, as distinct from the co-operative packing of indigenous produce, illustrated by Sandwich & District Growers Ltd v. Minister of Agriculture etc. ([1967] ITR 450).

However, in Tetley Tea Co Ltd v. MOL ([1967] ITR 541), the blending and milling of tea then packed into bags was held to rank as manufacture. The 1968 classification transfers from distribution to manufacture the activities of coffee roasting and blending and tea blending. These now appear in 229.2 which continues the mention of shelling nuts etc., on the basis of which it was held in the Court of Session that the treatment of raw potatoes by manual labour and automatic devices is an industrial process so as to qualify as manufacture for the special market of the catering trade (MOL v. Shieldness Produce Ltd (46 ATC 189). An extension to cooked beetroot seems to be heralded by the case of Birmingham Pre-packers Ltd v. Fowler (The Times, January 31st, 1969).

The development of quick-freezing has led to the allocation of a separate sub-heading for this process in the context of meat and fish products (214.1) and fruit and vegetables (218.2). This process had been validated as manufacture in Dobson v. MOL ([1967] ITR 426) and Wm Freeland & Sons (Aberdeen) Ltd ([1967] ITR 457), although the complexities of a slaughterhouse were held to lie in the distribution sector in Carlisle Butchers Ltd v. MOL (46 ATC 322). Perhaps by a logical step, at the other end of the thermometer scale, the processing of fruit and vegetables by heat treatment is accorded mention in 218.3, and it may be noteworthy that 214.2 now includes the preparation of oven-ready poultry.

Petroleum and natural gas

It has been found necessary to divide the former Order IV comprising CHEMICALS AND ALLIED INDUSTRIES into GENERAL CHEMICALS (Order V) and COAL AND PETROLEUM PRODUCTS (Order IV). The latter does not include extractive industry which is allocated a new heading, 104 within Order II (MINING AND QUARRYING), to comprise exploration (including boring for) and extracting petroleum on land and off-shore, inclusive of natural gas and its condensates. Producers' off-shore pipe-lines are included but not land pipe terminals owned by associated companies or the Gas Council.

The new Order IV comprises headings 261, 262 and 263 previously grouped with chemicals, oil refining being included under 262. A separate sub-heading 261.2 has been created for low temperature coke and other manufactured fuels.

Chemical manufacturing

The formulators of the revised classification deserve to be congratulated for having introduced a system related to logical function, into the vast field of raw materials based on industry in place of agriculture. This is particularly noticeable in TEXTILES (Order XIII, replacing X) where the emphasis is on the type of process rather than the source material, e.g., 414.2 (worsted spinning) has its narrative rephrased to read 'Spinning of yarns on the worsted system'. Natural and man-made fibres share in topmaking and the jute industry with a special mention for glass fibre in weaving (413).

Glass itself has its place among such constructional materials as bricks, pottery and cement (Order XVI, replacing XIII). The descriptive narrative is expanded to cover manufacturing glass fibre roving, mat, chopped strand and roving, and thermal insulating materials.

The main achievement has been to abandon the nineteenth-century preoccupation with dyestuffs and to substitute a dichotomy between inorganic and organic chemicals. The latter comprise separate chemically defined organic compounds, that is, containing carbon but excluding condensates, polymers and copolymers, elemental carbon and such simple compounds as calcium carbide and carbon dioxide. These basic divisions make up headings 271.1 and 271.2, heading 271.3 being reserved for end-use compounds such as hypochlorites and simple phosphate or phthalate plasticizer chemicals, also nuclear fuels and radio-active elements, compounds and isotopes. Chemical mixtures are also included in 271.3, although compounds with additives of convenience (e.g., water, solvents or stabilizers) do not rank as such.

Swords into razor blades

It is perhaps an appropriate commentary on the change in Britain in the twenty years from 1948 that the heading 273 which previously denoted EXPLOSIVES, including the filling of bombs and shells, is now given over to cosmetics, bath salts and perfumes. Explosives are now relegated to 279.3 together with fireworks and matches as a sub-heading of OTHER CHEMICAL INDUSTRIES (279).

This change has left 272 for exclusive occupation by pharmaceuticals, the description of which has been broadened to cover products for therapeutic and prophylactic use, and with the addition of veterinary products, a logical change from the former grouping with animal foods under 219. Fertilizer manufacture (278) is raised to the dignity of a separate heading, as are soap and detergents (275).

The opportunity has been taken to transfer vegetable and animal oils and fats from 275.1 to 221 in Order III (FOOD MANUFACTURING). Paint (274) no longer includes the cement-based varieties now included with constructional cement (464). Printing ink is relegated to OTHER CHEMICAL INDUSTRIES as 279.4, along with SURGICAL BANDAGES etc. (279.6) and FORMULATED PESTICIDES and other phytosanitary products (479.4).

Photographic techniques have expanded to a marked extent in the recent decade. Sensitized photographic film and plate and processing chemicals have been removed from 351.1 (in the new INSTRUMENT ENGINEERING Order) to form a separate sub-heading 279.7 at the end of Order V (CHEMICALS AND ALLIED INDUSTRIES). However, demarcation problems with the service industries have occupied the attention of the Tribunal and the Courts, in view of the separate mention of commercial photography in 899.2. Thus in Earlham Colour Studios Ltd v. MOL (The Accountant, February 8th, 1969) montage-making for customers was held to belong in the latter heading.

Metal-using manufacture

The metal-based industrial classification has also been reorganized to reflect the trend to control and precision Order VI (METAL MANUFACTURE, previously V) has been expanded slightly to recognize the development of indigenous aluminium activities. However, ENGINEERING AND ELECTRICAL GOODS has been split into Order VII (MECHANICAL ENGINEERING), Order VIII (INSTRUMENT ENGINEERING) and Order IX (ELECTRICAL ENGINEERING). Greater detail has been developed with extra sub-headings, e.g., electro-medical equipment is now elaborated as including infra-red, ultra-violet, radiant heat, etc., lamps for diagnosis and therapy; electrical and electronic equipment for stimulation and massage; heart, kidney and lung machines, sterilizing equipment and reading aids (367.2).

The new emphasis is on electronic as opposed to electrical equipment, as in railway signalling (367.1). Other mentions include video tape-recorders, audio frequency amplifiers and document copying equipment. Modern developments have led to the formation of three additional headings – BROADCAST RECEIVING AND SOUND REPRODUCING EQUIPMENT (365), ELECTRONIC COMPUTERS (366) and RADIO, RADAR AND ELECTRONIC CAPITAL GOODS (367).

Refrigerating machinery

Refrigerating machinery for non-domestic purposes is classified in Order VI as 339.1 (other mechanical engineering). Prestcold (Central) Ltd v. MOL (47 ATC 21) was heard in the High Court a year ago where the Tribunal's decision was that assembling parts to form an installation representing a cooling room at hospitals, banana store-rooms and abattoirs fell to be classified as construction (heading 500). This decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal [1968] TR 317, which accepted the propriety of classification under 339 where assembly had to be carried out on the site because the size of the components made it impracticable to carry out the operation in a factory beforehand. The further point was made that this latest decision was consistent with an independent Tribunal decision to that effect in R. Gordon (Kingston) Ltd ([1967] ITR 644).

This decision is also consistent with that arrived at in relation to industrial plant and steelwork now analysed in greater detail under heading 341. In Turnill v. MOL ([1967] ITR 456) the erection on site of outsize tanks and steel chimneys from components adapted on location was approved as manufacture. Heading 341.5 now specifies the manufacture for non-structural uses of storage tanks, spheres, process pressure vessels, heat exchangers, pipes, bins, bunkers, hoppers and chimneys. Another decision confirming the manufacturing rather than constructional character of industrial pipe installation was that in MacKnight v. MOL ([1967] ITR 648).

As the Reliant Tool case (supra) shows, the functions of a designer have tended to be treated as non-industrial through the apparent official tendency not to recognize the value of productive effort which cannot be expressed in terms of tonnages. However, in Lowton Structural Steel Ltd v. MOL ([1967] ITR 374), the Minister's objections to an establishment which produced all the calculations and drawings (from which another establishment fabricated the steelwork) were overruled. Heading 341.3 now spells out the manufacturing character of contractors responsible for the design, procurement, construction and commissioning of complete plants for process industries, although consulting engineers in private practice are excluded, as in Engineering Designs (Ipswich) Ltd v. MOL ([1968] ITR 62).

'Man is a tool-using animal . . . without tools he is nothing, with tools he is all'. Thus wrote Thomas Carlyle. The development of metal-working machine tools is illustrated by the amplification of heading 332 to include manufacture of equipment for high energy rate forming, electrochemical machinery, ultrasonic erosion, etc., with electron beams and laser machines.

Hydraulics and handling

The attentive crowds around a building site show the fascination of automatons which lift or dig at the push of a button. A new heading 333 comprises PUMPS, VALVES AND COMPRESSORS, with additional mention of hydraulic machinery, pumps and motors, control and ancillary valves, actuators, boosters, cylinders and power packs. Again, developments in mechanical handling have led to the appearance in 337.1 of references to bucket wheel reclaimers, cableways and cableway excavators, feeders and dragscrapers, live storage racks, powered overhead runways, suspension railways and telphers; pallet hoists, palletizers, stacking machines, tipplers and non-vehicular tippers.

Although the manufacture of builders' hoists is mentioned in 337.4, the provision and erection of scaffolds for building contractors is classified in 500 (Construction) according to the decision of the High Court in Scaffolding (Great Britain) Ltd v. MOL (46 ATC 292).

A problem of demarcation arises in relation to the provision of steel for manufacture. In H. J. Stone Steel Co Ltd v. MOL ([1967] ITR 612), the hire processing method was used, that is, although the specification and control of the product was the appellant's function, the melting, pouring and annealing of the alloy took place on the premises of a manufacturer who had the necessary equipment and who acted as sub-contractor. Nevertheless both elements ranked as manufacture. Again, in MOL v. Dyas & Fowle Ltd (46 ATC 147) the cutting and supply of 'tailor-made' metal blanks was seen to be manufacture, although the only available pigeon-hole was 399 (residual metal industrial, now in Order XII).

Transportation

SHIPBUILDING AND MARINE ENGINEERING is denoted Order X (previously VII), and includes off-shore oil and gas drilling rigs, and VEHICLES follow in XI. An attempt is being made to segregate wheeled tractor manufacturing (380). A topical flavour is added by sub-heading 383.4 which comprises the manufacturing, assembling, modifying and repairing airframes, complete aircraft, gliders, guided weapons, spacecraft, launch vehicles, sub-orbital vehicles and associated ground equipment. Hovercraft are classified under 383.3.

Section 2 of the 1966 Act provided for simple refunds to agriculture, utilities and transport other than that classified in 709. Heading 707 specifies air transport in terms of scheduled air lines, airports and air traffic control centres. In Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity v. Swift Travel Services Ltd (The Accountant, February 1st, 1969), the Court found insufficient evidence to support the Tribunal's finding that the company's air-handling activities were an integral part of the running of the airport and the case was remitted for re-hearing. Possibly this was done with the position in Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v. MOL

([1968] TR 225) in mind. That concerned refuelling activities and the High Court (46 ATC 262) side-stepped the issue by treating more than half the employees as engaged in selling. The Court of Appeal was much bolder and by a majority of two to one were of the opinion that the activities in dispute were not integral with the operation of the airport. However, leave was given to appeal to the House of Lords.

Utilities

The gas industry is not entitled to refunds but this privilege is accorded by section 2 (3) (iii) of the 1966 Act to electricity (602) and water (603). In C. Maurice & Co Ltd v. MOL ([1967] TR 205) the Court of Appeal restored the Tribunal's decision that the laying of cables came within the distribution of electricity, although the High Court (46 ATC 247) had decided otherwise. This case will soon be heard by the House of Lords although the issue appears to have been prejudged by the 1968 classification which now mentions the laying of electricity cables, overhead lines and line supports, as a specific activity of the construction industry (Order XX, formerly XVII) which is not entitled to refunds. Another new mention in that context is that of on-site industrialized building, as foreshadowed in George Wimpey & Co Ltd v. MOL (47 ATC 18).

Waste recovery

In an industrial society waste recovery is a sophisticated activity requiring skills not dissimilar to those applied to natural resources. Nevertheless, integration with manufacture was not established in Carfax Waste Paper Co Ltd v. MOL (47 ATC 3) and I. Goldman Ltd v. MOL (47 ATC 11) relating to wool recovery or in MOL v. Wandex Plastics Ltd (47 ATC 8). However, a favourable classification under 109 in Order II (MINING) was obtained for slag heap excavation in Holytown Building Materials Ltd v. MOL ([1968] ITR 175).

Miscellaneous services

An alphabetical list of industries has been issued by the Central Statistical Office to facilitate identification of minimum list headings and the 1959 edition was reprinted in 1966 with amendments, although a replacement geared to the 1968 classification is in hand. However, the alphabetical list has no official standing as regards selective employment payments, as transpired in Cotton Controllers (Liverpool) Ltd v. Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity ([1968] ITR 339), where the Tribunal refused to accept the classification in 705 of a business of cargo superintendents. The company was denied refunds, being classified instead as a service incidental to transport (709.1). A comparable problem arose in Hay's International Services London Ltd v. MOL (47 ATC 14) which the Court remitted for further evidence.

A test case was successfully taken to resist a proposed classification as dealers in skins for enterprises of which the activities comprised trimming, grading, sorting, curing and de-fatting hides and skins, and sorting, grading and preparing animal fats and bones (City & District Butchers' Hide Skin Fat and Wool Co Ltd & Others v. Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity ([1968] ITR 294)). Following the Reliant principle (supra) these were included in 431.1 (Order XIV, LEATHER, LEATHER GOODS AND FUR, previously Order XI). At the other end of the manufacturing process the sewing of button bunches for carded sale was held to lie outside that process, a decision endorsed by the High Court in Samuel Johnson & Sons (London) Ltd v. MOL (47 ATC 24) with some hesitation. A considerable principle was said to have been raised and leave was given to appeal.

In the introduction to the new list a special point is made of the system of classifying repair work by reference to the 'hardcore' or 'software' sector serviced. This is illustrated in McGuire v. MOL ([1968] ITR 24). In this connection it is noted in Statistical News (3.22) that the revised United Kingdom classification is closely in line with the United Nations International Standard Industrial Classification. It seems a pity, however, that the opportunity was not taken to adopt the latter's decimal basis instead of adhering to the antiquarian and confusing use of roman numerals for the XXVII Orders.

Export services

The accountancy profession (871 in Order XXV) has recently given proof of its international value to the United Kingdom economy, but pleas from the export service industries for relief from selective employment tax have had to contend with objections based on administrative difficulties. Some progress has been made in elaborating more refined distinctions for the service industries, including the important tourist industry. Possibly the forthcoming report by Mr W. B. Reddaway will serve to hasten recognition of the fact that not all service is feudal or orientated to the indigenous consumer, a recognition inaugurated for the hotel industry in development areas by section 52 of the Finance Act 1968.

The opportunity was also taken (section 52 (6)) to make good the previous failure to empower the Minister to modify a combination or dissociation of premises deemed to rank as establishments, effected at the instance of an employer under section 10 (3) of the 1966 Act. An illustration of the practical importance of identifying separate premises as such appears from Wilson v. MOL ([1968] ITR 235) which concerned a dentist's workshop at the end of a garden. On a larger scale it seems likely that this type of distinction will lead to the evolution of general principles such as are familiar in relation to income tax, as illustrated by Abbott Laboratories Ltd v. Carmody (47 ATC 88).

MANAGEMENT INFORMATION

Inflation and Decision-making

THE impact of inflation upon company financial reporting has been discussed sporadically since the end of the Second World War. In practical terms little seems to have been done other than periodic revaluations of assets and discussions on methods of pricing issues of materials etc. from store. A more up-to-date look at the problem was provided by Professor W. A. Paton in an article entitled 'Observations on inflation from an accounting stance', in a recent issue of the Journal of Accounting Research.

This was not so much a review of the accounting consequences of inflation, as an examination of some of the decision-taking implications of living in an inflationary era. After discussing some of the concepts of measuring changes in the purchasing power of the monetary unit, the author proceeded to examine the change in economic relationships which it causes. If all values could be adjusted simultaneously, then inflation would not present a problem since economic values would remain constant in relation to each other, the only change being in the money values by which they are expressed.

In practice, not all prices and values can be adjusted to the effect of inflation. Some are much more sensitive to change than others. Where there are long-term contractual arrangements it may be impossible to adjust to inflationary changes for a number of years, for example, in the case of long-term borrowing. Where an inflationary situation persists for some time, this fact will gradually tend to influence people's attitudes to lending. As the author observed:

> 'With sustained inflation there is eventually an effect on the cost of contractual capital (interest and preferred stock rates), and hance on capital formation, as the plans and actions of savers and investors are influenced.

Effect of inflation on decision-making

It is not, however, merely the impact upon savers and investors. Managers are constantly involved in decision-making processes of various kinds, in the course of which they must evaluate the alternative courses of action as far as possible in money terms.

One of the most significant factors in decision-taking is that of uncertainty. There are uncertainties about future sales trends, future cost patterns, the effect of technological change, Government regulations, and so on. The one thing that is certain about the decision-making process is that as the areas of uncertainty increase, managers will try harder to avoid taking a decision at all and so in the long-run increase the problem.

Quite apart from current trends of more Government interference, inflation itself injects a major element of uncertainty into the business decision and will, therefore, tend to influence the decisions that are made. To this could be added that the longer the period of time covered by the decision, the greater will be the influence that inflation will have upon its eventual outcome. Typical of such decisions is the capital investment decision which will have such a significant effect upon the long-term profitability of the business.

The business will be damaged when for one reason or another it is unable to adjust the disturbed economic relationships, for example where it has a long-term contract at a fixed price with a customer. Wherever it is possible, the business should retain the flexibility of adjusting money values to take account of inflation. This is not always possible as, for example, in Britain where capital allowances are related solely to original cost. Managers should, therefore, retain and exercise as far as they can their ability to maintain the basic economic relationships of their business.

The failure to recognize the diminishing value of the monetary unit may produce some quite undesirable attitudes to values. If a price has remained constant during a period of inflation, there is often a failure to realize that the price has been reduced in real terms. On the other hand, the fact that prices have tended to increase is not necessarily an indication that the true realization value of that product has increased. If inflation has proceeded at a greater rate, then the real value may actually have declined.

In spite of having lived with inflation through several decades, people are still slow to translate between different price-levels. The individual's conception framework of a scale of monetary values seems to change very slowly. This is reinforced in financial circles by the use of various indices which purport to measure changes in value over time. Quotations for insurance policies are a mixture of current and future values. The Financial Times Index is designed to show changes in the values of shares. But if someone who invested £100 in a share when the index was started and now realizes £400 on sale, believes that he has made a handsome profit, he may be sadly disillusioned if he adjusts the cost of the share to today's £s.

The attitude of government in this respect is antediluvian. In the formulation of taxes upon both income and capital gain, there is a consistent refusal to recognize that there is such a thing as inflation.

The distortions in economic values arising from inflation occur not only within the individual business, but also between such businesses. The long-term lending situation is typical of such distortions. If, over the term of a twenty-year loan, prices have doubled, then the borrower has been relieved of the burden of one-half of the debt at the expense of the lender (perhaps it is not without significance that that governments are the largest borrowers).

The slowness of change in people's conception of monetary values is the reason they will still lend money in such circumstances. It takes a long period of substantial inflation for the penny to drop, but when that fundamental change in attitudes outlined in the quotation from Professor Paton at the beginning of this article takes effect, people will begin to demand that loans be expressed on some more stable terms than £s, or a much higher return to compensate for the risks of inflation, or will decide to enjoy the fruits of their money now by spending it.

Quite apart from the problem of recording and measuring the activities of the business which affect the work of the accountant, the activities of management as a whole may be seriously impeded. Emphasis today is being placed upon the desirability of management defining the objectives and goals of their business. Such objectives, whichever approach is adopted, are going to require a measurement of return on capital employed. Inflation cuts across this in two ways.

First, there is a continuing revision of the real value of the capital employed; the required profit may be set at too low a value. If the balance sheet shows a capital employed of £2 million, and the target return is 10 per cent, then the goal for profit is an annual value of £200,000. If, however, in present-day £s the capital employed is £3 million, then the target profit should be £300,000.

Secondly, the basis for presenting the annual profit is historical cost. The cost of resources matched against sales revenue tend to be understated and, of course, the attitude of the Inland Revenue pegs capital allowances on historical cost. Through these effects, the profits as reported are higher than they would be if presented in terms of real values.

On the assumption that inflation is likely to continue at its present rate, managers must seriously reconsider their attitudes to it. Their decisions are based upon reports expressed in money values, and they must be quite clear in what kind of money values. If serious distortions are likely to occur in money values, then their assessments of the operating activities should be geared to some kind of index adjustment to arrive at the real values of those activities.

Taxation Cases

Full reports of the cases summarized in these columns will be published, with Notes on the Judgments, in the 'Annotated Tax Cases'

C.I.R. v. Korner

In the House of Lords
February 19th, 1969

(Before Lord REID, Lord HODSON, Lord GUEST, Lord UPJOHN and Lord DONOVAN)

Income tax – Farming – Family partnership – Father and mother living in farm-house – Two rooms used for farm business – Whether farm-house was farm land – Whether cost of maintaining farm-house deductible – Income Tax Act 1952, sections 124 (1), 137 (b), (c), 313, 526.

The appellant taxpayers, a family, jointly owned an agricultural estate of about 1,817 acres, 1,768 of which were farm land. The estate was divided into five farms, one of which was let and four of which were occupied by the appellants for farming. There was a house on each of the unlet farms, occupied by a foreman employed by the appellants. During the relevant period the two parents lived in another farm-house, and the father managed the farming business on behalf of the family. They employed a factor to supervise the day-to-day work on the farms, but the father had overall control, and kept the statistical and financial records. His management activities required him to reside in the house in question in order to carry on his work. He usually spent only one hour a day on farm business although occasionally up to five or six hours. He used one of the rooms for book-keeping and another room for interviewing callers on farm business. The house was fully furnished, and was the home of the father and mother, and their children and grand-children occasionally stayed there on holidays.

It was accepted that the house was the farm-house within the meaning of section 526 (1) of the Income Tax Act 1952.

The taxpayers contended that the whole of the rates, repairs, maintenance and insurance incurred in respect of the house in question formed a proper deduction in computing their farming profits for tax purposes. It was contended on behalf of the Revenue that nine-tenths of the expenditure in question should be disallowed, in that to that extent the expenditure was not for the purpose of the farming business, but for personal purposes. The Special Commissioners decided in favour of the Revenue.

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Session): as the house in question was the farm-house, it was within the definition of 'farm land' in section 526 (1) of the Act; and the whole of the expenditure was deductible in computing the farming profits.

Como Confectionery Products (London) Ltd v. Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity

In the High Court of Justice (Queen's Bench Division)
January 28th, 1969

(Before THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE (Lord PARKER OF WADDINGTON), Lord Justice EDMUND DAVIES and Mr Justice BLAIN)

Selective employment tax – Refund of tax – Premium – Manufacture discontinued – Product then bought – Resold in small packets to wholesale trade – Whether part of manufacture – Whether manufacture of packets of product – Selective Employment Payments Act 1966, section 1 – Minimum list headings 217, 499.

The company manufactured and distributed sweets, but in 1967 the factory was destroyed by fire. The company then bought sweets, made them up in small packets, and sold to the wholesale trade. Some packets had pictures on them, and some had cards inside.

It was contended for the company that it was still engaged in part of the process of manufacturing the ultimate product sold, namely, packaged sweets; and alternatively that it was now engaged in the manufacture of packaged sweets. The Industrial Tribunal decided against both contentions.

Held: the Tribunal's decision was correct.

Partnership

(Oyez Practice Notes, No. 60).

by I. G. C. STRATTON, LL.B., and I. S. BLACKSHAW, F.R.S.A.

Oyez Publications, Solicitors Law Stationery Society, 25*s*.

Despite the development since 1907 of the principle of limited liability, partnership as a form of business association is still very much with us. It is unique in the obligations which it imposes upon its participants and the present text is timely. Like other titles in the Oyez series, it is primarily intended as an aide-mémoire to practitioners of the law, but those accountancy students who are not daunted by a price of 25*s* for a 100-page paperback will also find in it a useful general conspectus of the subject.

However, the failure to include a section on the effects of 'holding out' and the concept sometimes referred to as 'quasi-partnership' is a notable omission which should be made good in any subsequent edition. And, whilst the learned authors are, of course, entitled to hold their own views on the comparative merits of arbitration and litigation in resolving partnership disputes, these are by no means general. It appears to have been overlooked that one advantage of a properly-drawn arbitration clause is that the arbitrator can be a person with first-hand knowledge of the wages of the particular trade or profession, which would have to be proved in litigation. A provision for an arbitrator to be appointed 'by the President for the time being of the Institute of Chartered Accountants', would probably be void for uncertainty in the absence of a further geographical indication, there being three such chartered institutes within the United Kingdom alone, and several others throughout the Commonwealth.

Amongst the minutiae, it might with advantage be positively stated that salaries and drawings are inadmissible in the absence of specific agreement (at present this point is left to inference). A partnership between a solicitor and an unadmitted person is illegal only as regarding the practice of law, and not necessarily in other activities; and the transatlantic form of the word 'guarantee' is a needless irritation.

No standard text on partnership appears to be considered complete without a reference to Garner v. Murray, and the present is no exception. Although beloved of examiners as an exception to the general rules of partnership, the practical value of this case is, in fact, extremely limited – no doubt because it is perfectly simple to include in a partnership agreement such terms as will effectually anticipate this particular difficulty.

A History of Accounting and Accountants

Edited by RICHARD BROWN, C.A.

Originally published by T. C. and E. C. Jack in 1905; reprinted in 1968 by Frank Cass & Co, London. £6 6*s*.

It is unusual – indeed bordering on the unique – for a straight reprint to be made of a book over sixty years after the date of its original publication. The volume was first issued under the auspices of the Society of Accountants in Edinburgh, and as reviewed in The Accountant of August 26th, 1905, it was published to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the granting of the Royal Charter of the Society.

There is one deviation from an otherwise perfect reprinting, and that is the omission from the title page of the qualifications of Richard Brown, the editor, and one of the co-authors. He was a Scottish chartered accountant who for 24 years was secretary of the Edinburgh Society of Accountants, and was subsequently elected to its presidency.

The volume consists of two parts. The first is devoted to the history of book-keeping and accounting and comprises one chapter on the art of numeration (or method of counting), and five chapters on the early form of accounts. Well produced plates illustrate a variety of examples, including an account of disbursement of the Athenian State from 418 to 415 B.C. and specimen pages from the ledgers of Genoese merchants written up in 1422. The second part is entitled 'A history of accountants', and its ten chapters deal not only with the professional accountancy bodies in the British Isles, but also survey the development of the profession and conditions of practice in the eastern as well as the western hemisphere. The authors have covered this topic in so comprehensive a manner that reference is made to practically every society of accountants that existed up to the year 1905.

Just as examples of accounts and book-keeping resembling the modern form have been found in Italy, it is to that country that early evidence of the practice of accountancy as a profession has been traced. Italian book-keeping was introduced to England in 1543, and was improved upon to such an extent that ten years later an original English treatise appeared on the subject. Indeed it is stated in this volume that 'Great Britain on the whole has led the way in these matters'.

The editor of this informative volume was the founder of the Scottish Institute's antiquarian collection of books on accounting and related subjects, and so it is not surprising that the History should conclude with a bibliography of works of antiquarian interest.

Corporate Strategy

by H. IGOR ANSOFF.

Penguin Books, Harmondsworth, 5*s*.

Corporate strategy is a fashionable subject at the present time: this is a statement which can be justified in a number of ways, but perhaps the easiest one is to refer the reader of this review to the list of participants at the first national conference on 'Corporate long-range planning' held in London last month.

Mr Ansoff has written a book for the subject of the moment, and the only valid British complaint about it is that it was written in America and was first published in 1965. But forgetting this small chronological point for the moment, here is a book which is entirely in tune with current management thinking. Mr Ansoff gives his book the subtitle of 'an analytic approach to business policy for growth and expansion' and he succeeds in really telling the business that has not previously approached corporate planning in a formalistic way how to go about it.

His argument starts from a clear definition of strategy in a business sense, and proceeds from this point to explain why a business may decide that the growth that it needs cannot come from within itself, and thus why it must look outside. The book also shows how to measure the amount of growth that has to be sought from outside, and then how to set about looking for the right kind of diversification prospects to provide the required growth. This is good value within about 200 pages.

Mr Ansoff deserves to achieve a wide readership in Britain, not only because he has a well-reasoned argument to present in favour of corporate planning for growth, but also because he marshals his argument in faultless English (and it is not the transatlantic dialect) and in a most scholarly manner. The notes, references and indexes are a model for writers seeking to establish business administration as a worth-while subject for study at undergraduate and graduate level. There is some terminology to be learned or accepted, and the early chapters impose some intellectual discipline in this direction, but the pay-off is clear in the second part of the book when the author is able to give quantities of practical guidance on how to establish strategies and how to put them into profitable effect just because he has established the terms which are necessary to the subject.

Corporate strategy suffers in the minds of some people from the fact that it is an esoteric – or even unnecessary – subject. It is sometimes argued that businesses have lived, developed and prospered in the past without this kind of jargon and with no comparable overhead expenditure. Why have we now got to establish expensive corporate planning departments in order to qualify as really up-to-date enterprises? Mr Ansoff provides the answer to this question quite early on when he shows that expansion is an essential element of business strategy. If the reader is unlikely to agree with this thesis he should avoid the book: but if it seems to strike a chord he can read on with confidence.

There is, perhaps, one warning which should be given. Mr Ansoff thinks in terms of charts, block diagrams and matrices – in other words he likes to present and fix his argument with diagrammatic illustrations. Most people will find this approach extremely helpful, but for someone who does not like the approach a warning may be timely.

Improving Business Results

by JOHN W. HUMBLE.

McGraw-Hill, Maidenhead, for Management Centre Europe.

The subject matter of this book is extremely important if directors are to so orient management effort at all levels that the organization moves as an integrated whole to specific profit targets. Only by such a process can management hope to be in charge of events, rather than continually trying to adjust the activities of the business to accord with external changes.

This cohesion of effort by business management will be achieved among other things by identifying the objectives of the business and translating these into a series of performance targets in a 'management by objectives' situation. It is a pity, therefore, that a contribution to this important area of management by a distinguished author sponsored by the Management Centre Europe, should present a rather superficial survey of the topic. Indeed, reading the book one gets the impression that it is made up of a series of seminar handouts together with the related visual aids.

Dealing with company objectives the author recognizes that 'to make a profit' is an important, if not necessarily the only, objective; and that the business must be able to attract new capital if it is to expand and to do so it must offer an adequate return. Yet criteria to define acceptable profitability and return standards are not examined at all. Since these criteria are critical for setting the parameters for subsidiary goals and targets, this is a regrettable omission. The book would also have been improved by an analysis in depth of the factors which help determine long-term profitability, e.g., the relationships between profit margins, turnover of capital employed and return on capital employed, together with their subsidiary determinants.

However, those managers who are concerned with the identification of management goals and objectives, and with developing managerial talents, should find the book presents a useful survey of this particular area.

Whitaker's Almanack

J. Whitaker & Sons Ltd, London. Complete edition, 27*s* 6*d*; shorter edition, paper covers 15*s*.

The 1969 edition of Whitaker's Almanack, now in its one hundred and first year, again maintains its high standard as a valuable work of reference.

A wealth of information is given about industry, finance, commerce, public affairs, government, and the arts. Cabinet changes and ministerial appointments and the reorganization of Ministries have been noted, while the Shipbuilding Industry Board, Race Relations Board, and the Parole Board have been added in the public offices section.

Under 'Topics of the day', initiated in last year's edition, is included the gold crisis; the Royal Commission on Trade Unions and Employers' Associations; the 'brain drain' and many others.

For the first time the names of the 85 firms honoured by the Queen's Award to Industry are recorded; full details of the two-tier postal system introduced this year appear under the postal regulations section, while inland letter rates are shown separately in all editions for quick reference. Tidal predictions for 1969 are given in British Standard Time although, in accord with scientific practice, GMT continues to be used throughout the astronomy section.

The Commonwealth section has been further rearranged with Barbados, Mauritius and Swaziland appearing as new independent States, bringing the total of Commonwealth 'members' to 29. The outline maps include a new map of Cyprus and revised maps of the USA and Canada.

Financing the Chinese Government Budget

by GEORGE N. ECKLUND.

Edinburgh University Press. 21*s*.

This is a pioneering volume prepared under the auspices of the Social Science Research Council's committee on the economy of China. Dr Ecklund describes the methods used by Communist China to raise tax revenue during the years

1950–59 within the context of its economic and political programmes. As the author points out, the Communists exhibited considerable ingenuity and flexibility in developing a revenue system that contributed substantially to the control of inflation and to reconstruction of the economy in 1950–55; to the socialization of private business and farming during the period 1952–56; to the development of heavy industry in 1953–57, and to rapid industrial growth during 1950–59.

The tax laws were formulated to favour heavy industry and State enterprises and to penalize activities considered to be non-essential. Before 1957, the tax system was somewhat progressive but inequalities in personal income and wealth were largely eliminated by various forms of expropriation. A substantial revision of the law in 1958 removed nearly all elements of progression in the Chinese revenue system and, by 1959, the system was at best proportional or even slightly regressive.

Finance and Commerce

Exporter 'first-class'

ENGLISH China Clays is a company that gladdens the heart of every President of the Board of Trade and every Chancellor of the Exchequer. Both would undoubtedly say that if every British company achieved English China Clays' export performance there would be no such thing as balance of payments problems or trade gaps. But not every company has a product as much in demand and as readily exportable as china clay. However, that must not be allowed to belittle the company's export achievements which are excellent even taking into account the company's special position.

Of total group sales of £58·47 million in the year covered by the accounts – from which this week's reprint is taken – the clay division accounted for £31·29 million. Of that £31·29 million as much as £22·75 million was represented by direct exports from the UK with other overseas sales accounting for a further £723,000. Home sales of clay were worth £7·82 million.

Other divisional sales were: quarries and civil engineering £15·52 million; building division £11·96 million, and transport and services division £6·41 million. In terms of profits the clay division provided £7·79 million out of total group earnings of £10·85 million. The quarries and transport divisions were on a par with profits of £691,000 and £692,000 respectively, while the building division supplied £124,000 and the parent company £1,548,000 – largely on the notional basis of inter-group interest on long-term advances.

Double change

Lord Aberconway, the chairman, explains that most of the increase from £7·72 to £10·85 million in pre-tax profit came from higher export earnings obtained from china clay, either because of devaluation or because of increased emphasis on the higher-priced speciality clays. Total tonnage of china clay delivered did not greatly increase but more than three-quarters of U.K. production was exported.

Profit was some £170,000 higher than it would otherwise have been by reason of the net effect of a double change from the start of the year in depreciation practice. On one hand depreciation of plant and machinery was changed from the 'reducing balance' basis to the 'straight-line' basis whereby, as Lord Aberconway explains to shareholders, 'the estimated future useful life governs the rate and is determined by the location and category of plant.'

It was considered that this method would more realistically represent the value of the group's plant. Following a revaluation of the group's freehold and leasehold minerals and properties, it was considered 'proper to start to depreciate industrial buildings from these enhanced and more realistic values, again by the "straight-line" method, according to the estimated useful life of each building, subject to an assumed maximum life of 50 years'.

Lifeblood

The revaluation disclosed a surplus of close on £12·25 million which has been written into the accounts. A similar revaluation was made six years ago and at that time disclosed a surplus of some £6 million over book values but the excess was not incorporated into the accounts.

The revaluation was undertaken by a team of chartered surveyors from the company's Estates Department led by Mr R. F. Silverlock, F.R.I.C.S., who has been with the group for many years and is one of the leading authorities in the country on mineral valuations. The intention is to keep values under review by carrying out further periodical valuations adding any increase in value to, or deducting any decreases from, the capital reserve. Although the company has started to depreciate industrial buildings it is not considered appropriate, or necessary, to create a theoretical provision against possible diminution in the value of mineral deposits.

Neither has it been considered 'relevant or necessary' to provide for any liability to capital gains tax on the increased value of properties. By far the major proportion of the new values lies with mineral deposits and the industrial buildings related to them. As mineral operators, the company does not contemplate selling these assets which are the lifeblood of the business.

Borrowing powers

Last November, shareholders sanctioned changes in the board's borrowing powers and under the changed articles the borrowing ceiling is now some £50 million, against which there is loan capital of £8·78 million plus overseas borrowings bringing the total to some £9·5 million.

The margin, Lord Aberconway admits, seems at first sight more than ample. But present exchange control regulations will compel the group to finance any overseas developments mainly or wholly from moneys borrowed overseas. Any substantial acquisition may make considerable inroads into the borrowing margins not only because the purchase may be financed to a significant extent by money borrowed on a long-term debenture or notes, but also because any company acquired may itself have extensive liabilities in the way of long-term borrowings.

With the ample borrowing margin in hand, however, the preference capital is being replaced by unsecured loan stock. The board was wary of making that change against the background of what was considered inadequate borrowing powers.

Getting back to the group's export achievements, Lord Aberconway winds up his statement by emphasizing the group's determination to push ahead in overseas markets. 'Where', he says, 'we find in any foreign market supplies from another overseas country competing with ours, we shall not rest content until, by meeting the customer's requirements by the consistency of our products and by the reliability of our service, we have driven away our rivals.'

(f) Depreciation

No depreciation has been provided on mineral deposits, office premises, and port works as none is considered necessary. Industrial buildings have been depreciated by reference to the number of years of the estimated useful life of each with an assumed maximum for this purpose of fifty years.

The basis adopted by the United Kingdom companies for the calculation of depreciation of Plant, Machinery and Equipment was altered on 1st October 1967 from the reducing balance to straight line method by reference to the estimated lives of individual categories of plant. Plant held by overseas companies is depreciated at the maximum rates allowed by the appropriate fiscal authority. If no alteration had been made, the provision for depreciation of Plant, Machinery and Equipment for the year would have been £3,186,000.

5. Goodwill

Goodwill represents the premium paid on acquisition of shares in subsidiary companies less amounts written off.

NOTES—continued

(i) All freehold and leasehold properties within the United Kingdom were valued at 30th September 1967 by the Group's staff of Chartered Surveyors on a 'going concern' basis, showing a surplus over book values of £12,346,720. The values of these properties have been adjusted accordingly in the accounts of subsidiary companies.
(ii) The accounts of all overseas subsidiaries have been incorporated in the consolidated accounts at the rates of exchange ruling at 30th September 1968, and as a result there arises an increase in the sterling value of the fixed assets of those subsidiaries.
(iii) The investments of English China Clays Ltd. in subsidiary companies have been revalued to take account of these surpluses. Opportunity has also been taken to revalue further the investments in certain overseas subsidiaries to take account of amounts capitalised by these companies in previous years.
(iv) At the end of the financial year the principal subsidiary companies of English China Clays Ltd. were:
English Clays Lovering Pochin & Company Ltd.
English China Clays Sales Company Ltd.
E.C.C. Quarries Ltd.
Selleck Nicholls Williams (E.C.C.) Ltd.
All the above companies are incorporated in Great Britain, and in each case English China Clays Ltd. holds 100% of the ordinary shares which is the only class of shares in issue.
In the opinion of the Directors the businesses of the above subsidiary companies are those which principally affect the profit and/or assets of the Group; to include details of all other subsidiaries would require particulars of excessive length.

a simple solution to a perennial problem

Clients may often ask you whether it is still possible to make really advantageous provision for school fees.

The answer is yes. Under our special Trustee Scheme, capital sum payments in advance continue to attract substantial benefits.

* The capital earns an attractive rate of interest, which is free of income tax, surtax and capital gains tax.
* The termly payments are not aggregated with the parent's income for tax purposes.
* The capital sum can be freed from estate duty liability instantly.

As an example of what can be achieved, a capital sum of £1890 will produce fees of £600 a year for 5 years, starting in 10 years time.

No company expects to make a profit out of maintaining its share register. In many companies today, old-fashioned methods of carrying out this tiresome, worrying yet essential function lead to intolerable peaks of pressure.

IBM is a leader in putting this work where it belongs – on to machines and away from the desks of key personnel. Now all this IBM experience is here to help your company in a ready-prepared package. You need not have a computer; you hire the service from an IBM Data Centre.

Your company benefits by freeing staff from time-consuming routine work. You avoid committing valuable office space. The computer copes automatically with the maintenance of the ledger, the production of bulk and direct payments at dividend time, annual returns, notices of AGM's and with bonus and rights issues. The service is flexible and efficient for both large and small registers. And because the programs are ready written, the cost is kept down. That's very much part of the package deal.

CITY NOTES

THE London stock-market is having a second try at a technical rally, the first – after a near 10 per cent fall in the main index – having fallen foul of the surprise change in Bank rate to 8 per cent. If followers of the stock-market had any misgivings about the forthcoming Budget, then the Bank rate change certainly reinforced them.

A relatively easy Budget would make no economic sense at all, coming not much more than a month after a return of Bank rate to the devaluation crisis level of November 1967. Although attempts have been made to play down the crisis element in the increase, it is difficult to know what else can be written into it.

Bank rate at 8 per cent plus chairmen of the leading banks assembled on the Chancellor's mat hardly smacks of economic or fiscal goodwill. If, as events would appear to suggest, the economic outcome of 1969 depends upon the banks reducing their lending to the 1967 level despite price rises, import deposits and a higher level of industrial activity, then 'crisis' seems a very usable word.

Since 1964 'crisis' has been translated by the stock-market into terms of inflation and rising share prices. The bad cause of 'crisis' has had the good effect of pushing equity prices higher as the distrust of money grew. There is no certainty that the position has changed now.

* * * *

HAD a communiqué in the political idiom been issued after the meeting between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the chairmen of the main banks it would almost certainly have mentioned 'full and frank discussions' which is invariably translated into argument but no agreement. The banks certainly reiterated the point they had made earlier – that they refused point blank to bankrupt their customers for the sake of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's monetary policy. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, not being a businessman, probably does not mind about bankruptcies unnecessarily forced – but the banks do. At the same time it can be said – and it is a view firmly held in the Bank of England – that the banks have not done all they can to achieve a reduction in well-covered lendings where the borrower would barely feel the effect of the sale of the securities backing the loan.

* * * *

TRANSLATION of a recent statement by the President of the Board of Trade that he was considering the question of a statement on merger policy into a firm assumption that there will be such a clarification was probably optimistic. The Board of Trade's problem is that if it lays down guidelines or principles on mergers then it loses its independence of action under new sets of conditions.

Obviously the Board of Trade put the Unilever-Allied Breweries merger proposal to the Monopolies Commission because it was something new and out of the ordinary and because if it were allowed to go through unimpeded it would almost certainly have touched off a string of similar operations.

* * * *

BANK rate at 8 per cent for any length of time will have to be reflected in building society interest rates and that will undoubtedly pose a considerable, and hitherto unexperienced, problem for the societies. On many outstanding mortgages it will no longer be able to maintain monthly payments, extend the loan and still achieve reduction in the outstanding amount. Already some mortgages are in a very marginal position.

It will be interesting to see whether the building societies make the obvious move of demanding higher monthly payments under such circumstances or whether they will take their courage in both hands and institute something new, such as the restriction of Bank rate-affected interest rates entirely to new loans. This system has been advocated but whether it can be or will be immediately introduced is another matter. The building society movement is not particularly good at spot decisions.

Need to Revise Training Methods

Chartered Accountants' Dinner at Cardiff

The whole system of educating trainee chartered accountants needed to be revised, declared Mr Stanley Dixon, M.A., F.C.A., President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, when he spoke at Cardiff last Friday.

Addressing members and guests at the annual dinner of the South Wales and Monmouthshire Society of Chartered Accountants in the City Hall, Mr Dixon said education for the young chartered accountant these days was not merely a question of employing him in a practice with the hope that he would gain experience there, coupled with night school study or a correspondence course.

The whole method of education needed to be revised. Trainees should be taught the principles which lay behind the experience they would need. It was for that reason that the nine months' full-time courses had been introduced at further education establishments, including the one starting at the Glamorgan College of Technology in the autumn.

Training problem

One of the problems now being faced was how long after the period of training contract should the theoretical and academic teaching be separated from practical experience.

In any profession – particularly the accountancy profession – there was more to learn than the technical knowledge: there were other requirements such as the principles of professional conduct and the ability to give independent judgement.

The business community relied on the opinion of the chartered accountant as an independent judgement. It was given because it was right, regardless of expediency, regardless of the short-term interest of the client himself. That was why the accountancy profession stood so high.

Earlier, Mr Dixon said that at the very basis of the new training proposals was the realization of the great challenge which faced the profession. There was a need to recruit members and students who would become part of a body with an even higher stature. A start would be by raising the standard of entry to two 'A' level certificates.

Some people would argue that many entrants with 'O' level certificates had turned out to be first-class accountants. He accepted that, but times had changed. Young men who formerly would have come into the profession now had the opportunity to go to universities where they were trained in the relative disciplines of the university in mathematics and economics to graduate in business studies. The answer was for the profession to revise their whole method of education.

Sir Cennydd Traherne, T.D., K.ST.J., M.A., LL.D., J.P., Lord Lieutenant of Glamorgan, proposing the toast of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, touched upon the subject of discipline and authority.

The discipline of hunger and want had largely disappeared in Britain, he said, but the discipline of having to give an account remained and was more relevant than ever before.

With the introduction of PAYE income tax the whole nation had been put to account, and this inquisitiveness of the Inland Revenue into one's internal affairs covered every aspect of industry and commerce.

He was impressed to read of the attractions to young men and women which the profession offered. In this computer age it was most important that the very best product of intelligent youth should find positions of interest and authority in the field of accounting, both in private practice and in industry.

The toast of the guests was proposed from the chair by the President of the Society, Mr J. B. Williams, F.C.A., and Mr Cyril Moseley, B.A., replied.

Proposed Scheme will Strengthen the Profession

President Tells West of England Members

Cheltenham's magnificently-restored Regency gem – the Pittville Pump Room – was the elegant setting for the West of England Society of Chartered Accountants' annual dinner on Thursday of last week, when the Society's President, Mr J. D. Askew, F.C.A., welcomed to his home town about 275 members and guests.

Proposing the toast of the Borough of Cheltenham, Mr Askew said he had lived in the town for about 20 years and had no hesitation in describing it as 'the finest of its size in the whole of the kingdom'.

Responding, the Mayor of Cheltenham, Councillor the Rev. C. H. Markham, O.B.E., said it had taken the Institute a long time to discover Cheltenham, for the Institute was born in 1880 and had only just come round to visiting the town. He hoped that they would not leave it so long again.

The toast of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, was proposed by Sir Percy Lister, D.L., a director of Hawker Siddeley Group Ltd. Sir Percy described the Institute as one of which they should all be proud. It had done splendid work in the past and was doing so now; he had no doubt that the future would make further great demands.

Good communications

Members of the Institute played an important role in the guidance by communication, in the very great number of important organizations which they served. The word 'communication' meant more today than ever before, because good communication between employer and employee was one of the best possible means of preventing strikes, as against a lack of understanding and lack of good relations.

Replying to the toast, Mr Stanley Dixon, M.A., F.C.A., President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, paid tribute to Mr Askew and to the advancement of the West of England Society under his presidency. He also paid tribute to Mr C. Croxton-Smith, M.A., LL.B., J.P., F.C.A., Vice-President of the Institute, who was a member of the Society.

Mr Dixon posed the question 'What exactly is a profession?' It certainly had something to do with professional conduct, he said, and accountants could justifiably lay claim to a very high code. An essential feature of their profession was independence of view, and the expression of opinion which they gave, because they were right not because they were expedient.

'Independence of judgement'

In a short-time the scheme for the development of the profession would be put before the members; he was aware that many felt that they could not vote in favour of the proposals because they believed it struck at the root of what a profession meant. It was proposed to train for membership in industry, and many opposed the scheme because they believed it was impossible to train for their profession in industry. They said that such a student was first and foremost the servant of the company which employed him; that his first loyalty was therefore to that company, and accordingly it was impossible for him to acquire the independence of judgement that was the very hallmark of the Institute.

But if he believed there was the slightest risk of the integrity and independence of the practising members of the profession being put in jeopardy, said Mr Dixon, he would not be a party to putting forward this scheme for the consideration of members. If they really believed that that would be the effect, they would be right to vote against it.

'I believe precisely the opposite will happen,' he declared.

The man who was trained in industry in the future, if the scheme was accepted, would have the same kind of training as in a practising office. It would be the task of a member of the Institute to impart to a student not only technical skill, but also the principles and ethics of the profession.

Principles to be observed

From the very beginning the student in industry would be taught that there were principles in the accountancy profession which he must observe, even if it was contrary to the wishes of those who employed him. So, far from being detrimental to the profession, he believed that the scheme would immensely strengthen it.

In three or four weeks, members would be receiving the papers on which the decision on that great and important question would have to be taken. He urged members to read the papers and ponder all arguments which were there set forth. He wanted it to be a vote of informed members who were aware of the principles on which they were being called to give their opinion.

Mr Askew proposed the toast of the guests and the Bishop of Gloucester, the Rt Rev. Basil T. Guy, responded.

Computers: Investment Grants

Mr ERIC LUBBOCK asked the President of the Board of Trade if he will give an estimate of the additional amount of investment grants payable on the basis that expenditure on computer software ranked for grant; and what was the amount of investment grants paid in the financial year 1967–68 on software included in the purchase price of computers.

Mr DELL: The information is not available. Applicants for grant are not asked to identify separately that part of the capital cost of a new computer which relates to software. Furthermore, I have no basis on which to estimate the amount of subsequent expenditure on software on which grant is not paid.

Mr LUBBOCK asked the President of the Board of Trade if he will give an estimate of the additional amount of investment grants payable on the basis that capital expenditure on installation of a computer ranked for grant notwithstanding the fact that the computer is leased and not bought outright.

Mr DELL: Investment grant may be paid on capital costs incurred by lessors in the installation of leased computers. Had grant been payable on installation costs incurred in 1967 by lessees the additional amount is estimated at about £1¼ million.

Mr LUBBOCK asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that his Department is allowing investment grants for data transmission equipment and computer terminals where these are located in the same building as the central computer, but not when they are carrying out an identical function at another location; and if he will give instructions for this distinction to be removed.

Mr DELL: Equipment whose primary function is data transmission does not rank for grant. The admissibility of other computer equipment for investment grant does not depend on its location, though other differences, e.g., of function or of ownership, can affect the decision whether grant is payable. If the hon. gentleman will give me details of any case where he believes there has been inconsistency of treatment I will investigate it.

Mr LUBBOCK asked the President of the Board of Trade why, in view of the fact that in a computer installation, both magnetic tapes and magnetic discs are used for the storage of information, investment grants are payable on the latter and not on the former.

Mr DELL: Grant is payable on an initial supply of magnetic tapes as part of the cost of a new computer, but not on subsequent purchases as these tapes have the character of consumable stores. Magnetic discs are, however, long-lived capital assets.

Prices and Incomes Board: Report

Mr RICHARD WAINWRIGHT asked the Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity what action she has taken on paragraph 47 of the Third General Report of the National Board for Prices and Incomes which proposed that employees should share in the capital growth of industry by receiving an entitlement to capital assets; and what further action she intends to take thereon.

Mr HAROLD WALKER: The Board suggested that this was a matter which would repay study. The subject is a complex and difficult one. We have been studying it and shall be giving further consideration to it in consultation with our colleagues.

Taxation

Mr MAWBY asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much of the increase in the Index of Retail Prices since October 1964 has been due to increases in taxation.

Mr HAROLD LEVER: Between October 1964 and January 1969 the Index of Retail Prices rose by 19·6 per cent, of which I estimate that increases in indirect taxation, including the selective employment tax, accounted for about 6 per cent.

Occupational Pension Schemes

Sir B. RHYS WILLIAMS asked the Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity what estimate she has made of the cost to employers of giving protection of pension rights to employees leaving service before retirement age by preserving their rights in occupational pension schemes; and what she estimates to be the additional cost of giving protection of pension rights in such circumstances by granting transferability.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EMPLOYMENT AND PRODUCTIVITY (Mr ROY HATTERSLEY): The cost of implementing the Government's proposals for deferred pensions would be £20 to £25 million a year. Universal transferability of occupational pension rights is not at present regarded as practicable. Were it possible to achieve universal transferability the additional cost might be in the order of £100 million.

Sir B. RHYS WILLIAMS: Do not those figures show the urgency of this problem? Will the hon. gentleman please tell the House what he intends to do?

Mr HATTERSLEY: I think the House, and indeed the country, have been told already in the White Paper which we published a month ago what we intend to do.

Sir B. RHYS WILLIAMS asked the Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity if she will introduce legislation to regulate occupational pension schemes, defining the status, responsibility and duties of trustees, the conditions under which such schemes may qualify for tax reliefs and the method by which the rights of individuals are to be valued on change of employment, and to appoint a registrar with authority to supervise the administration of occupational pension schemes.

Mr HATTERSLEY: There are already statutory provisions affecting both trustees of funds, including pension funds, and income tax reliefs for pension schemes. The calculation of pension rights on change of employment will be dealt with in the legislation to be introduced on the preservation of pension rights. We shall be considering, in consultation with representatives of occupational pension schemes, what supervisory arrangements will be necessary to give effect to these proposals.

Sir B. RHYS WILLIAMS: While welcoming that statement, may I ask the hon. gentleman to recognize that it would be disastrous for the future of the movement towards private occupational pension provision if there were to be publicized failures? Is not this something which the Government should take into account?

Mr HATTERSLEY: Certainly the Government would and do take this into account. Pensions schemes and the transferability element in the schemes are something which the Government are considering hand in hand with private firms. I am sure that in future investigations we will bear this point in mind.

Mr NOTT: Surely the White Paper does not commit the Government to introduce a transferability of pensions schemes? Why this reluctance on the part of the Government to do this? It would not cost the Government anything: what are the practical difficulties to which the hon. gentleman referred?

Mr HATTERSLEY: The White Paper commits the Government to preservation of pensions schemes but the difficulties about full transferability are outlined in the White Paper. Some people would argue the impossibility of calculating both the entitlement in the old scheme and means of translating that entitlement into the new scheme.

Valuation of Unsold Stock

SIR, – I wish that the ascertainment of market value was as simple as the learned judge seemed to imply according to your report (February 22nd issue), on the tax appeal by Freeman Hardy & Willis Ltd.

So far as the gross retail selling price is concerned, the price at which goods are offered for sale is not necessarily that which can be achieved. Furthermore, in a market affected by fashion and by complications of colours, sizes and fittings, it does not follow that, because one article of a line can be sold at a given retail price, the remainder of the line can all be sold at the same price.

More importantly, however, the use of retail selling prices implies the existence of a retail market and in this particular case, the only retail market available would be through the company's own shops. Otherwise all stocks would have to be disposed of at wholesale price in any event. The expenses of providing a retail market for subsequent disposal of the unsold stocks must surely be taken into account, and these expenses will presumably be related to the normal rate of gross profit. Thus, even working from an initial retail value – if this is capable of ascertainment – the ultimate net realizable value, after allowing for costs of disposal, will still be approximately the wholesale or replacement price. It does not appear from your report that the judge gave any consideration to the relevant selling expenses.

A further consideration is that in this particular trade (footwear) it is normal to buy a range of sizes and fittings in the knowledge that there will always be end sizes left which cannot be sold. It could be more appropriate therefore to attribute the cost to those articles which are sold and not to spread it over those which are not sold, and it is a pity that the judge did not develop his thought that the expense of purchase might be left to lie in the year when it was incurred.

Since there are important implications in this case, I hope that it will not be left where it is. Otherwise, Recommendation N 22 of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales may have to be re-written.

Yours faithfully,

Leicester. G. THOMPSON, F.C.A.

Management Consultants

SIR, – Generally speaking, one gets the impression of a mixed reception not without some misunderstanding being prevalent in industrial circles on the pros and cons of engaging the services of consultants in any capacity.

In the first place, there is surely an initial uneasiness about entertaining the idea, which of itself is bound to indicate doubt about management's ability to carry on without it or to have been found wanting. It is an open question of human psychology and a wrong assessment of values in respect of individual status and stature; in other words, a naked exposure of inefficiency.

This brief analysis is not too harsh or even unkind but, if anything, a common sense reflection of procedure to meet an obtuse situation. It could equally be one explanation for the growth of business mergers and take-over bids.

Yours faithfully,

Birmingham. FRANCIS B. WILLMOTT.

INCOME TAX AND CAPITAL GAINS TAX

A series of 12 articles first published in the British Dental Journal during the second half of last year have now been reprinted as a booklet entitled Income Tax and Capital Gains Tax. Written by Mr E. L. Harvey, F.C.A., and published by the British Dental Association, the text is most informative to practitioners and consultants in dental surgery, and will also be of interest to practising accountants.

Among the topics covered are: partnership changes, new and discontinued practices, travelling expenses, dual use of cars, and part-time appointments as consultants. Income tax, surtax and capital gains tax do not lend themselves to simple treatment and the author has therefore attempted to isolate the main features so as to bring a better understanding of them to members of the dental profession or their advisers.

The booklet, price 5*s*, is obtainable from the British Dental Association, 64 Wimpole Street, London W1M8AL.

Oxford University Occasionals 2

This year the result of the annual match played against the Oxford University Occasionals was decided by one goal.

The game, played on a heavy pitch, soon developed into a surprisingly fast and open contest, the ball being moved freely among the forwards although the wings were not used to their full potential. The Occasionals opened the scoring when a poor clearance from the C.A.s was collected by the left-wing who sneaked the ball into the net. The Accountants, pressing hard, were rewarded with the equalizer from Threlfall.

The second half saw the forward trio of Machin, Schanschieff and Threlfall looking dangerous until they reached the circle. The Accountants failed to take advantage of a penalty and later the Occasionals scored again to win the match.

TRANSFER OF LAND BOOKLET

The Country Landowners' Association has issued a new and enlarged edition of its publication Family Arrangements Involving the Transfer of Land etc.

The booklet, whilst making no attempt to provide a solution to capital taxation of the ownership of land, does, however, set out in intelligible terms the various aspects which need to be examined in order to find the most advantageous agreements. It deals also with estate duty, capital gains tax, income tax, surtax and stamp duty. The revised edition now contains a legal section and the whole document takes into account the taxation changes brought about by the 1968 Finance Act.

Copies of the booklet are available from the offices of the Association, 7 Swallow Street, London W1, price 17*s* 6*d* members, 21*s* non-members.

Decimalization and the Retailer

AN evening seminar on decimalization and the retailer was held in London last week by Masius, Wynne-Williams Ltd, the advertising and marketing agency, when the speakers included Mr N. E. A. Moore, secretary of the Decimal Currency Board, and Mr. H. Lincoln Jennings, food trades officer of the Co-operative Union.

Whilst much of what Mr Moore said has been previously reported in The Accountant and elsewhere, he did go into some detail about points on pricing and periodical payments mentioned in the two recent Decimal Currency Board booklets Points for Businessmen and Cash Transactions during the Changeover. He was also quizzed at some length during the question and answer session which wound up the evening about the loss of the sixpence which appeared to be very disturbing to the audience, particularly in view of recent announcements on the subject by the Post Office and some London councils. Mr Moore added that a number of matters which were not at present clear would soon be clarified by the Decimal Currency Bill which is at present before Parliament – where, of course, the sixpence has also been the subject of some discussion.

Mr Jennings dealt with many of the problems facing the retailer. He made it clear that as the retailer will bear the brunt of the changeover, he should be working out his problems now, in 1969, rather than leaving them until the last minute.

The main items were accounting, cash handling and pricing. On accounting he felt that the problems had much in common with other organizations, but it would help if as many firms as possible made known their decimal prices of goods well in advance of D-Day so that retailers could alter their records and re-price.

On pricing, things were already happening. The present half-penny disappears by August this year and most retailers have already moved a long way to discontinuing its use in pricing; in fact it is likely to be abolished by the Co-operatives some three months before this date. The half-crown will not affect pricing so much as cash handling and the guinea will also be a problem. An article at 20 gns now will be £21 after D-Day – and that may look like a price increase!

H-P agreements

Many agreements now being signed for hire-purchase or rental will extend through D-Day and these should provide for sums with decimal equivalents so that there is no need for re-negotiation when the time comes. The adjustment can be made either in the deposit or the final payment, or both.

It was pointed out that communication on matters of decimalization will be of fundamental importance and few buyers will be happy to receive, without adequate notice, dictatorial decisions worked out by suppliers.

There will also be an acute problem in self-service shops as price labels for several months may need to bear one or both prices and it was hoped that designers will remember this when designing packages.

'Guidance pricing'

The expression 'dual pricing' has been used, but it was suggested that this might well be called 'guidance pricing', as a shop will only sell in one currency or the other and show the alternative price for guidance only. Buyers who are responsible for fixing prices will need to study their prices and any changes required, not only in £ s d but also in decimals, from early in 1970 so that roundings up or down do not lead to a preponderance of losses as against gains for retailers.

On decimalization and metrication, a price of 15*s* a dozen becomes 15 pence per unit, but in decimal currency 75 pence per dozen becomes 6¼*p* per unit. Theoretically this could be solved by packing in tens so that 75*p* per ten would be 7½*p* each, but there is great difficulty in getting a good shaped pack out of ten or its smaller multiples. Some hard thinking will be required to decide what to do about this.

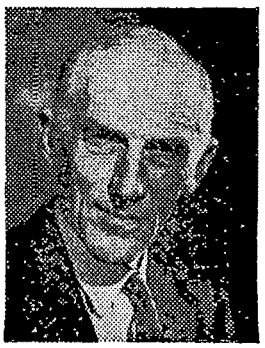
LIMITED



"An extremely active year for the Group"

Mr. Cyril H. Kleinwort
Chairman

A summary of the Statement by the Chairman, abridged from the 1968 Report & Accounts

The Results

An extremely active year produced a satisfactory increase in profits. The total dividend for the year is 22¾%, an increase of ¾%, the maximum permitted under the Government's present Prices and Incomes policy.

The Group

When we move into our new building within a few weeks, our London staff will be under one roof for the first time since the merger of Kleinwort, Sons & Co. and Robert Benson, Lonsdale in 1961.

Confidence that the merger would lead to expansion has been amply fulfilled, and the international nature of the Group's operations has been developed.

Kleinwort, Benson Limited

Kleinwort Benson had a most successful year in all departments. Earnings were substantially increased, and profit after tax increased to £1,805,938 (£1,296,202). £800,000 was placed to General Reserves against £300,000 last year.

At home and abroad the bank has provided an integrated service for an expanding international clientele. Acceptances, increased from £36m. to £54m., include a growing proportion of foreign currency business, and there is a similar trend in our loans and advances. Sustained activity in the bullion market kept Sharps, Pixley & Co. Limited very busy, with highly satisfactory results.

Unprecedented activity in bids and mergers overshadowed the other operations of the Company Finance Division. While there seems every reason to expect a continuation of the merger movement, Government involvement is making itself felt through the panel on take-overs, the I.R.C. and the Monopolies Commission; and it is far from easy to guess how these various bodies will develop. What seems certain is that in this region of increasing complexity, merchant banking advice will continue to be sought.

The marked tendency for investors and pension funds to use professional investment managers and investment funds has resulted in continued demand for our management and advisory services. We shared in the successful expansion of the M. & G. Unit Trust Group.

The Channel Islands subsidiaries have maintained satisfactory profit levels.

Our Australian associate, Merchant Bills Corporation, has completed its third year and is on a profitable basis. Eight months of trading enabled our newly acquired Geneva bank, Kleinwort, Benson (Geneva) S.A. to reduce the carry-forward loss we inherited; and in Brussels, Kleinwort, Benson (Europe) S.A. has had a most successful year.

Kleinwort Benson Investment Trust Limited

As forecast, the higher dividend to the parent company was covered by a smaller margin, but revenue should be maintained in 1969.

Due to the rise in the London Stock Market and the sharp increase in the dollar premium, the Trust's capital value rose from £24m. to £32m. Net asset value of the ordinary units has more than doubled in two years. Year-end investments in Great Britain, at 47%, and North America, at 36%, were similar to 1967, and the Government's guidelines offer little scope for increasing the present proportion of 5% of funds invested in Australia.

As the more favourable outlook for Britain's economy in 1969 appears to have been largely discounted by stock market prices at their present level, and in view of the likelihood of a less inflationary policy in the U.S.A. and the risk—not yet eliminated—of a further international monetary crisis, it would perhaps be over optimistic to expect the rise in value of the Trust's portfolio to continue at the same rate. Our confidence in the long-term prospects is unimpaired.

Management and Staff

Management and staff have worked under great pressure to achieve these very satisfactory results, and I would like to express my warm appreciation of their efforts.
